Two Worth-While Books

'e two volumes described below will be worth-while addition to any home lib'y. If you are about to renew your sub'ription to The Christian Herald take ad'ntage of one of these special offers, ad'g the small additional amount requ'd.

Ral People and Dreams

'argaret E. Sangster, Jr., does not make up'er stories and poems—they just form th'selves on the background of her mind as'inter sprites trace wonderful pictures or'indowpanes, and then simply because sh cannot help herself, she sets down a de'ription of these pictures. There are, in'l, in her new book, "Real People and D'ms," about eighty poems and thirty-tw short stories and sketches. This is th'work of a genius.

'e will send this new volume by Margaret E. 'ngster, Jr., handsomely bound in cloth, wi' a new photographic frontispiece of M'garet E. Sangster herself, and with illustr'ons for a number of the poems, together w' the Christian Herald for one whole ye', postpaid, for $1.85. Or, we will send to ol' subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this vo'me for sending us one new yearly subsc'tion to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

Little Sir Galahad

'Ve do not know when we have had quite a'uch pleasure in reading any book this ye' as "Little Sir Galahad" There is so m'h that is charming and humorous and in'nsely human in the whole story that it a'eals to the reader probably with greater fo'e than if the action were on a more d'ified level.

'Little Sir Galahad" is really a story of ' golden age in our own time. That beau-'il season that makes life radiant while i'asts.

't is as good a story as we have encoun-'ted in many a day, and that's saying a g'od deal.

'Little Sir Galahad," 376 pages, illustrated 'd handsomely bound in cloth, will be 'nt postpaid with one yearly subscription 'the Christian Herald for $2.00. Or, we will 'nd to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, 's volume for sending us one new yearly 'oscription to the Christian Herald with '50.

go. (5) The need of being on the alert to catch God's direction, following his leadings to the places we are needed most.

Emphasize the word "Arise." Whether from death, or from disease, or from sin, or from indolence, or from indifference, or from inertia—the ringing word of God and his messengers is "Arise!" Have the class find some of the big Bible verses in which that call sounds: Gen. 13:17; Josh. 1:2; Isa. 60:1; Jonah 1:2; 3:2; Matt. 9:5, 6; and especially Luke 7:14: "Young man, I say unto thee, arise." Tell the old story of the prodigal, and how when he came to himself he said: "I will arise and go to my father."

Give instances from history and from present-day life of men and women who have been aroused by a great vision, a great call to do new and splendid things. Urge your pupils to be on the alert to catch these new invitations to more difficult tasks. They may often hear, if they are listening, the Spirit's voice saying to them as to Philip long ago: "Arise and go toward the south unto Gaza." And while we are rousing ourselves to new tasks day by day we shall, as Peter did, say to those whose souls are sick or lifeless: "Arise!"

Study the passage in Proverbs giving the picture of a virtuous and industrious woman. This writer of Proverbs was evidently caught somewhat by the glamour of wealth. He wanted his model woman clothed in silk and purple; and she seems to have been in many ways quite a grand lady. The newer ideals of Christian womanhood emphasize a more perfect comradeship with those who are to be helped. The words of Jesus and his apostles show that the true riches and most beautiful adornments are modest, unostentatious, warm-hearted helpfulness. Get the girls to talking freely about their ideals of womanhood, showing them how the standards of Jesus will produce the most perfect character. Say something to the boys as well about the sort of girls they should seek as friends and the sort of women they will want one day to make their homes. Mention other Bible women who achieved beautiful characters—Ruth, Esther, the Marys and Martha.

"Through Gates of Pearl" in Book Form

MISS ALBERTSON'S SERIAL, "Through Gates of Pearl," has attracted such wide-spread attention and has comforted so many troubled hearts, that it is only natural there should be a call for its publication in book form We take pleasure in informing our readers that arrangements have been made for the book publication of this inspiring piece of literature. It will be placed on sale shortly at one dollar. Announcement of the fact will be made in the Christian Herald, through which the book may be purchased.

THE fiftieth anniversary of the Muncie, Ind., Young Women's Christian Association was celebrated recently. A member writes: "We felt the need of a larger building. Mr. Ball of this city offered to give $100,000 if the citizens would raise another $100,000 within ten days. A hard pull? Yes; but hard things are what awaken real enthusiasm. The pastors took an active interest and we got right down to work. We began January 25 and on February 4 the money was all promised and a little extra. That is the breezy way work is done here in the wide West."

DURING the month of January Rev. Herbert E. Ryder led the Christian Church of Puyallup, Wash., in a series of revival meetings.

For Real Bicycle Joy—

YOU have only tasted of real bicycle joy until you own a SMITH MOTOR WHEEL.

Smith Motor Wheel
DETACHABLE

Motorwheeling gives bicycling a fresh charm—the exhilaration and ease of power-riding. A sturdy, willing motor, which attaches in five minutes to any coaster brake bicycle, responds to the gentle touch of a handy lever; and in a twinkling your "mount" is a thing of life. Your pedals are footrests, after two easy turns.

Then the pulsing motor, obedient to your command, sends you magically on at any speed from 4 to 20 miles an hour. There is no jarring vibration, no grease or dirt. Special riding togs are unnecessary.

Up to 125 miles of new pleasure and "get-about" service are yours from one gallon of gasoline.

Little wonder that there are nearly 10,000 happy motorwheelists now!

Your dealer will demonstrate. Or write for our book "Motorwheeling."

HEALTH AND INCOME

Both Kept Up on Scientific Food

Good, sturdy health helps one a lot to make money. With the loss of health one's income is liable to shrink, if not entirely dwindle away.

When a young lady has to make her own living, good health is her best asset.

"I am alone in the world," writes a Chicago girl, "dependent on my own efforts for my living. I am a clerk, and through close application to work and a boarding-house diet, I became nervous, and got so bad off it was almost impossible for me to keep up in the office.

"A friend suggested to me the idea of trying Grape-Nuts food which I did, making it a large part of at least two meals a day.

"Today I am free from dyspepsia and the ills of an overworked and improperly nourished brain and body. To Grape-Nuts I owe the recovery of my health, and the ability to retain my position and income." "There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Answers to Financial Queries

W. J. V., ILLINOIS. An article on the Federal Reserve Act appeared in the Christian Herald, December 8, pages 1254 and 1255.

A. H. B., VIRGINIA. Shares of the San Toy mining stock are not entirely worthless—we have obtained a quotation of 4 cents per share.

J. F. M., MAINE. Write to The Texas Company, 17 Battery Place, New York City. This company is one of the largest dealers in lubricating oils in the world.

MISS M. M. D., PENNSYLVANIA. The shares of the International Pharmaceutical Company are very far from the investment class. We should leave the stock alone.

A. S., PENNSYLVANIA. Fox optical stock is worthless. This was one of W. M. Ostrander's promotions, and like most of his other promotions it went to the bad.

A. M. T. The Prudential Life Insurance Company is one of the five largest life insurance companies in the world, and its endowment policies are absolutely gilt-edged.

W. D. S., NEW YORK. Gulf States Steel 7 per cent. preferred stock is not without some degree of speculative merit, though the shares cannot be admitted to the same investment class as United States Steel preferred.

E. H. F., TEXAS. Tentative plans for a reorganization of the Western Pacific have been announced, but not approved. First mortgage bonds are selling at about 25 cents on the dollar—when they sell, which isn't often.

MRS. M. F., ILLINOIS. (1) Mississippi Valley Trust Company 5 per cent. farm loans are regarded as sound. (2) Middle West Utilities Company 10-year 6 per cent. collateral gold bonds, to yield 6½ per cent., are attractive.

MISS S. J. B., ILLINOIS. California eucalyptus plantation schemes have proven disappointing to small investors who have bought promotion stock. We can find no market for your forestry corporation 6 per cent. gold bonds.

MRS. H. A. W., PENNSYLVANIA. Mason City and Fort Dodge Railroad 4's, and Waterloo, Cedar Falls and Northern Railway 5's, both underlying issues of the Chicago and Great Western Railway, have a fair investment rating.

A. B., INDIANA. Mr. H. M. Geiger, president of the Geiger-Jones Company, Canton, Ohio, in a four-page letter convincingly demonstrates the firm's position in the matter of your Gramm Motor Stock and other securities sold by the firm. We have sent you the letter.

MRS. H. L. H., MINNESOTA. American Manganese Manufacturing stock makes no claim to an investment rating, though it appears to be a better speculation than the Dry Milk Company stock, and we are of the opinion that an exchange, as proposed, might be advisable.

D. H. K., NEW JERSEY. The Christian Herald cannot report on the value of Brooklyn real estate. We will, however, state that we took up the matter with Wood, Harmon & Co., who advise that your lots are in a good section of the city and likely to show tendencies to enhance in value.

MRS. F. B. A., MASSACHUSETTS. H. L. Barber, advertising in the name of H. L. Barber & Co., Great Northern Building, Chicago, Ill., is under Federal indictment for using the mails in the sale of stock of an alleged fraudulent company known as the Midway Chief Oil Company. Barber is now engaged in selling the stock of the Cream of Rice Company.

O. C. G. R., MISSOURI. We are in receipt of advices from Oklahoma City which indicate that the charges against the firm of Aurelius-Swanson Company have no merit, and that the firm's financial standing is in no way impaired. The firm has offered to repurchase its mortgages from dissatisfied holders, but none have so far accepted the offer, we are advised.

MRS. E. McB., OHIO. The building and loan association which strays from the legitimate investment field and loans the depositors' funds on farm implements and other chattels cannot be thought as highly of as an association which confines itself strictly to loans on real estate mortgages. There are plenty of building and loan associations in Ohio which confine their loans to improved realty.

W. C. F., VIRGINIA. United States government bonds possess the element of safety to such a remarkable degree that income return therefrom is necessarily very small—too small for most private investors. Government bonds are almost entirely purchased by national banks for currency purposes. The average yield from a United States government bond is slightly less than 2 per cent.

MISS L. M. S., MINNESOTA. Your $500 Twin Falls Oakley Land and Water Company first mortgage 6 per cent. gold bond has a market value of only $150, though we are advised that the troubles the company got into at the time of the Kuhn failure are slowly disappearing, and that the future holds out hope for higher prices for the bonds. The bonds are no doubt intrinsically worth more than you can get for them at the present time.

W. S., FLORIDA. The Southern Pacific is well regarded, though not as highly as Atchison. The former pays its 6 per cent. dividend with very little left over for surplus, whereas the latter pays its 6 per cent. dividend and has half as much again left over for surplus. We prefer Atchison, and believe that if you will purchase the stock for income, forgetting all about its relatively slight stock market fluctuations, you will never have cause to complain. Your Pennsylvania and your Steel preferred are sound investments.

J. B. W., PENNSYLVANIA. In buying 110 shares of Atchison common and 25 shares of Baltimore and Ohio common you made a sound and profitable investment, which should be permanently held for income. Don't watch the stock market. The daily rise and fall of quoted values indicate but little the intrinsic values of such issues as the foregoing. Your purchase of twenty-five shares of Inspiration Consolidated Copper is an investment that we would not have advised you to go into, though without doubt Inspiration is a great property, and capable of great things. Inspiration, like most other coppers, has had a big advance. What goes up must come down, and the faster the flight upward, the faster the tumble downward. A good many shrewd observers of the metal market are looking for lower prices for the copper stocks—and soon.

E. B. H., WISCONSIN. You state that you have from $2,000 to $3,000 to invest in sound securities yielding from 4½ to 5 per cent. We will suggest the following bonds at the prices and yields quoted:

	Price About	Yield About Per cent.
Central Pacific Railway 1st Ref.	91	4 55
Interboro Rapid Transit 1st Ref.	99	5 05
New York Telephone Co. 1st Gen.	99	4.55
Swift & Co. 1st.	100	5.00
Central of Georgia Ry. Consol.	101	4.85

The above bonds are listed in the New York Stock Exchange, can be instantly sold if you desire to do so, and are, we believe, thoroughly sound securities possessing a somewhat liberal yield. They may be obtained at the prices quoted from any large investment banker.

rs ve been obliged to borrow money for rposes directly resulting from the war the total of $355,380,000.

T Austro-Italian campaign has beei nuch more animated during the past eek, in large measure a result of the hting at Verdun, as the offensive on e part of the Italians has been and aken very largely for the purpose of a ng the French by creating a distrac n and forcing the Central Powers to h ry reinforcements to this line, and thus eaken their power of reinforcing thei roops in France.

T principal fighting has been on the Ison River line, in the general direction of Trieste. Artillery bombardmen of the Austrian positions have bee ncessant, and infantry attacks by the alians have succeeded each other at s rt intervals. The net results of this eat effort have not, however, been com ensurate with the cost. Up to the pres t time the Austrian lines, though mon ntarily penetrated at places, have not een pierced permanently at any poin and after a week's hard fighting the versaries remain absolutely in the sam positions as they were before.

It y is still not at war with Germany, thou it has been reported during the wee that Great Britain is urging Italy forn lly to declare war on that power. The talian political situation remains une , and the financial position is grov ng steadily worse.

In Albania the Austrians and Bulgari s with their Albanian auxiliaries are aking steady progress southward tow d Avlona, driving the Italian outpostin before them, and it is reported that n a short time the possession of that town must take place, unless the Italians conclude to evacuate it without defense and cross the Adriatic to Italy.

Everything is apparently quiet in Greece, and the Allies have made no move northward from Salonica, where they now must have something like 250,000 men. As the spring is beginning to be advanced in this part of the world, we shall probably soon see some definitely military action taken by the Allies in this quarter, unless they intend to withdraw their troops, as it does not seem reasonable to suppose that they will maintain so great a force unemployed much longer.

Many rumors reach us from Rumania, the one contradicting the other, and of late Bulgaria and Turkey have also been the subject of much gossip as to their future action, particularly in regard to their making a separate peace. In neither case does the political or military situation justify much weight being given to this gossip.

Holland has again been brought into the glare of war by the sinking of the Holland-Lloyd passenger steamer Tubantia either by a mine or as is claimed by officers of the steamer, a submarine, on March 16 on her way from Amsterdam to South America. The steamer carried between eighty and ninety passengers and a crew of 300. It is said there were some Americans among the passengers. She was sunk on the second day out. Almost all who were aboard were saved, and the few who perished are said to have been killed by the terrific explosion when the vessel was struck. The news from Holland shows a great state of excitement and even war-like talk.

T O questions came to the fore im- ediately upon the decision to send an pedition into Mexico. One was the uestion of munitions of war en out to Carranza through American port the other was the question of tran ortation for American commissary tor 'At the time the orders were issue o General Funston to get Villa, one carg of 500,000 rounds of rifle cartrid s was en route to Progreso, Mexico. No attempt was made to intercept his argo. Another consignment of 000 0 cartridges consigned to the Carranz governor in the state of Sonora was ntercepted at Douglas, Arizona. On arch 16, customs authorities at Douas received instructions from Wasngton to release the ammunition, and was delivered on the next day to Geral Calles. The release of this mu nition was said to have made a very ood impression upon the Mexican lead s as an evidence of American good fait Carranza, from his temporary hea uarters at the provisional capitol at eretaro, which city he has been expe ed to plan to make the permanent cap l of Mexico, sent out orders, on Ma 15, to all of his commanders notiyin them that the American pursuit of V a was authorized, and giving them orde which will result in cooperation an in direct assistance to the Ameri- an oops. Nevertheless, reports from varus sources in Mexico indicate a con erable undercurrent of opposition to t entrance of American troops into the untry.

A bill, previously passed by the Hou with but one dissenting vote, cast by eyer London, Socialist, authorizing the cruiting of the United States army to ll war strength of 120,000 men, pas d the Senate on March 15 and was app ved by the President on the 16th. Ste were at once taken by the War Dep tment to secure the 20,000 volun eer authorized. A rush of men was rep ed at all the recruiting offices.

T e American expedition camped on the ight of the 16th something over twe y miles south of the Mexican bor r and on the 17th a further advance of tenty-five miles was made without hav g encountered any hostile Mexican Reports that snipers had wounded s ne members of the expedition were den l. In the matter of transportation the War Department took prompt act n. Private automobiles were leased in all of the towns along the border, and the War Department asked for bids for auto trucks to be delivered at once. Bids were asked for fifty-four trucks and two wrecking wagons, each equipped to handle a damaged machine and either repair it on the spot or bring it back to its base. The transport service has been maintained with autos and regular army mule wagons. General Funston desires to use the Mexican Northwestern Railroad for stores only, but Carranza authorities had not consented at last reports.

By March 19, the American forces under General Pershing had penetrated more than 110 miles into Mexico, the exact location being given in the dispatches according to the latest European model ["name deleted by censor."] According to information wired to General Gavira, the Carranza commander at Jaurez, Villa was practically surrounded in the wild mountainous country west of Chihuahua near the Babicora ranch which he passed going south on Saturday. He is now on his native soil where he has many adherents, and any failure of the Carranza troops to hold tightly their part of the chain would enable Villa to escape the present trap and make necessary the setting of another. Villa and his bandits are reported to have killed still more Americans in the progress of their flight southward, but the principal American colonies at Cases Grandes and Galeana were not molested. American forces are now in a position to protect these colonies. Latest reports before going to press contained no word of any fighting in Mexico as yet.

The American consul at Torreon with about 40 other Americans returned to American territory as soon as possible after the entrance of the expeditionary column into Mexico. A large number of other American citizens have also returned to American territory.

The order to General Funston is to take Villa dead or alive. It was said that Carranza hoped to take Villa before the American force was fairly under way. Villa will probably be driven northward toward the advancing American troops. It is scarcely expected that he will be taken alive, as he realizes that his life will be forfeited whether he is delivered to Carranza to be executed as a bandit, or brought back to the United States to be tried for murder. Villa will prefer to die fighting.

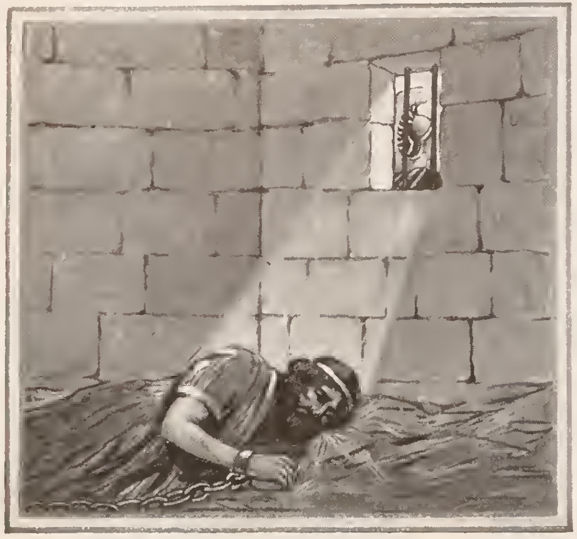
BIBLE PICTURE CONTEST

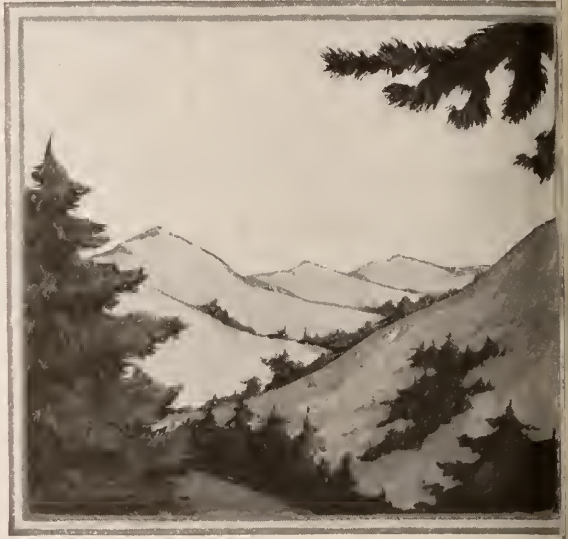
There is a time for all things; the time for deliberation and further dela has passed; the time to start solving the pictures is indeed at hand.

Picture No. 43



TRULY a period of well over a month will be granted contestants, after the appearance of the last of the sixty pictures, to complete their pleasant task of fitting suitable verses to the pictures. But are you counting so confidently upon that generous allotment of time as to be letting these present days of opportunity slip by unnoticed? You should begin the Contest without further delay! If you procrastinate too long you will be hurried in making your selections, and you will not obtain the maximum of benefit from the Contest, nor give it your maximum of thoughtful attention. By all means start now. You may accept any of the offers below and secure a complete Outfit at once. With it will come all back pictures free. Clip pictures 43, 44 and 45 from this page, and save the balance of the pictures as they appear. Start today!

Picture No. 44



Here, in a Nutshell, Is an Explanation of the Bible Picture Contest

THE Bible Picture Contest consists of sixty pictures, published in the Christian Herald at the rate of three each issue.

An invitation is issued to all to submit Bible verses that will be fitting or applicable names for the pictures, expressing the scenes shown by them.

It is believed that in competing in this Contest all will be benefited by increased familiarity or welcome further association with verses from the Bible.

In order to make the Contest equally fair to all, and simply a test of good judgment in selecting the best fitting verses—not a test of Biblical knowledge—a short list of some 2,000 verses was designated as those from which all verses submitted as answers must be chosen. Free access to these verses can be had by anyone in any Bible; but for convenient use the eligible verses are printed in a handy booklet called "Gems from the Bible."

Verses submitted for the pictures may be written on separate sheets of paper (but exactly as designated in the Rules) or written in the neat little Reply Book, which is given with "Gems from the Bible." For ways to obtain both books see offers below.

With "Gems from the Bible" and Reply Book the Christian Herald will give you all the pictures which have been published up to date, free.

AS to the human element in the Gastineau mines, the labor and management seem to be excellent. There are now about 1,100 men employed upon the property. Fully one-third of them are Americans, and, in addition, there are large numbers of English, Irish and Scotch. There are also Slavs, Italians, Swedes and Norwegians. Common laborers get $3 and upward a day, and skilled men $4.50 and $5. The experts and officers receive the highest of salaries.

I find that the employees are well cared for. The company has large bunk-houses or dormitories in which the men sleep, and it also has dining-halls which will seat five hundred at one meal. I sat down with that number at dinner. The food was excellent and better cooked than in most of the restaurants scattered throughout the States. The company serves two thousand such meals every day for the miners, and an equal number, I judge, to the hands in the mills.

I was interested in the kitchens. They have steam cookers and bakers. They have boilers that will cook a barrel of soup at a time and ranges as wide as a dining table and twelve feet in length. The vegetables are peeled by electricity, the coffee is ground by an electric current, and the same force washes the dishes and mixes the bread, taking a whole barrel of flour for one big lump of dough.

Connected with the eating establishment is a bakery that turns out cakes and pies by the hundreds and serves hot rolls every night and hot cakes for breakfast. The company charges its men $1 a day for board and room, and the receipts therefrom are spent in keeping up this part of the establishment.

For the married men there are comfortable cottages lighted by electricity and heated by steam. The rent paid is $4 per month per room, and each family boards itself. The company has its own stores, where the men can buy for cash or for coupons advanced on the basis of their monthly wages. There are also clubrooms, equipped with billiard arrangements, and tables for cards, checkers and dominoes. The men work day and night shifts of nine hours each, and for this reason the clubrooms are usually filled day and night by those who are off work. There is also a reading room, with the latest magazines and papers, and the men have their clubs of one kind or another.

The Correspondence of Prof. David Smith, D.D.

A NONCONFORMIST minister recently preached on the question, "Should we pray for the dead?" taking as his text Mark 5: 35, 36. He answered the question in the affirmative. He quoted the following verses in support of his view I Cor. 15:29, I Peter 3:19; and a verse in Revelation which I cannot now trace. Will you be so good as to give us your views?

I HAVE frequently "given my views" and stated my reasons for regarding the practice of prayer for the dead as unscriptural, irrational, and—on a truly Christian view—unnecessary and undesirable. "He is not the God of the dead but of the living; for all live unto him." If the question be a mere speculation with you, then leave the dead to God, and think of the living, and pray for grace to love them more and serve them better. The dead are with God and have no need of our intercession; but the living are here, and they have sore need of charity and kindness. Neither of the passages you mention, when rightly understood, countenances prayer for the dead. I Cor. 15:29 is a much-vexed passage, and merely to enumerate all the various interpretations would require one, as Bengel says, to write a dissertation. Suffice it to indicate three interpretations which have had a long and wide vogue. (1) The oldest and perhaps the least unreasonable finds here a reference to "vicarious baptism." Believers submitted themselves to the ordinance in name of their unbaptized dead, in order that these might rank as Christians and share in the felicity of the resurrection. This practice certainly prevailed, probably through a misunderstanding of the passage, in the third century and later, but only among heretics, particularly the Marcionites and the Cerinthians.* It was a crass superstition, and St. Chrysostom pours unmeasured scorn upon it. (2) His own interpretation is less than satisfactory. He explains the passage by the contemporary administration of the sacrament. The candidate repeated that article of the Creed, "I believe in the resurrection of the dead," and on the strength of this confession of faith he was at once baptized. The idea is that "baptism for the dead" signifies "baptism on the ground of faith in the resurrection of the dead." (3) Another patristic view is that baptism for the dead means "death-bed repentance" (baptisma clinicorum), administered on the approach of death to such as had postponed the sacred ordinance. And this is the view of Calvin and Bengel. It seems to me that the clue to the apostle's meaning lies in verse 18. He has been dealing with members of the Corinthian church who were puzzled by the doctrine of the resurrection and were disposed to reject it; and he appeals to them to pause and consider. He reminds them how precious the faith of the resurrection was to their hearts and what sacred issues depended on it. These were sorrowful days at Corinth. It appears that a pestilence had been raging in the city and death had been busy in its dwellings (compare 11:30). It was a stern call to the careless church, and not a few had hearkened to it. Corinth was a heathen city, and the Gospel had brought disunion into many homes where husbands or wives had received it and their partners had rejected it (compare 7:12–16). To the latter death proved a persuasive evangelist; and when their beloved fell asleep in the peace of Christ, their hearts turned to the faith which they had scorned. Moved by the hope of a blessed reunion, they confessed the Saviour and were "baptized for the sake of their dead." This furnishes the apostle with a poignant appeal to those skeptics. If there were indeed "no such thing as a resurrection" (verse 12), then that tender hope was a fond delusion, "they which are fallen asleep in Christ have perished." Have patience, he pleads. Consider the sacred issues that are involved, and do not lightly fling so precious a hope away.

"And still awhile the old thought retain,
And yet consider it again!"

David Smith.
The College, Londonderry.

Questions and Answers

H. W. T., Argyle, Pa. 1. When Jesus first sent out the twelve apostles he told them not to go by the way of the Gentiles nor to any city of the Samaritans. In the second year of his ministry we find him in the Samaritan country, talking with a Samaritan woman, and remaining two days in the city of Samaria. How are these facts reconciled? 2. Also, why did Jesus command some of those whom he had healed not to tell others what he had done?

1. We must remember that Jesus was working out a definite and careful plan. It was also a progressive plan. The things he did one year were preparatory to what he was to do the next. The first preaching was to the Jews, but it was perfectly consistent for him to minister to the Samaritans the year following. Further, it was not the disciples who preached to the Samaritans, but Jesus himself. It is perfectly reasonable to believe that he himself might deliver a message at a certain place which he could not at the time entrust to his disciples. They had not yet gained the vision that God's grace was to be offered to all peoples. That came much later. They needed the experience of Pentecost to give them that vision and the power to follow it. 2. The same explanation applies here. There were certain locations and certain times at which it was not expedient, in view of the Saviour's future plans, to have his work advertised.

Mr. James P. Lafferty, editor of the Catholic Standard and Times, New York, writes to the Christian Herald concerning the attitude of the Catholic Church toward Protestant marriages, which is not generally understood. He quotes from the "Ne Temere" decree, Par. XI. 3, as follows: "Non-Catholics, whether baptized or unbaptized, who contract among themselves are nowhere bound to observe the Catholic form of sponsalia or marriage." This decree took effect on Easter, 1908.

A. J. H., Tacoma, Wash. Can you tell me what is (1) the greatest book, (2) the greatest speech, (3) the greatest oration of the English language, and (4) the greatest poem?

1. The greatest book, from the point of view of its influence on history and human life, is without doubt the Bible. 2. The Sermon on the Mount is the greatest speech. Demosthenes's Oration on the Crown has been called the greatest secular oration. 3. Lincoln's Gettysburg speech is probably the greatest English speech. 4. The greatest poem is the book of Job; the Iliad might be considered as ranking second.

A Reader, Newton Junction, N. H. Authorities differ in regard to the route of the Exodus and in the identification of the places mentioned in the book of Exodus. The road from Rameses to Succoth is thought by McClintock and Strong to have been through a valley called Wady et-Tumeylat. There are many hills in the part of Egypt through which the Israelites passed on their way to the Red Sea, but they seem to have avoided them by passing along the wadies or valleys. In the Sinaitic Peninsula are many mountains and mountain passes. Maps of the wanderings, illustrating the various interpretations of the Scripture record, which differ in minor matters, can be found in most Bible dictionaries.

Mrs. S. F., Montezuma, Kan. Let none persuade you to accept the doctrine that every one's life is all arranged beforehand by divine omniscience, and that there is no escape from it. That is rank fatalism, and has no foundation in the Scripture. God in his wisdom gave to man the power to distinguish between good and evil, and the intelligence to apprehend the right from the wrong, the true from the false. It is our duty to use that power wisely. The Creator has established laws for the spiritual government of his universe, and according as we recognize and obey these laws or neglect and violate them, so shall we be approved or disapproved. He sent his Son to proclaim the Gospel of free salvation to all who would accept, and we have the plain assurance that it is not the divine Father's will that any should perish (II Peter 3: 9).

A. A. B., Pasadena, Calif. No such passage in the Bible.

K. G. D., Romulus, N. Y. In regard to Romans 8, see notes in the Sunday school lesson for January 23 in the Christian Herald for January 12. You have evidently failed to notice the capital "S" in Spirit. To live "after the Spirit" means to be directed and inspired by the Holy Spirit himself. The desires and impulses of the flesh may be compared to a powerful stream or electric current. There is tremendous power in the physical impulses. But in the natural state this power is selfish: it ministers to self; it takes no account of God. To have a fleshly mind means to let the flesh have its selfish, greedy, godless way. This is living "after the flesh." In the New Testament the word "flesh" sometimes signifies merely the body; sometimes this attitude of mind and will that yields to the impulses of the body in defiance of God's law and the needs of others. When a man comes under the control of the Holy Spirit this power that is in the bodily impulses is used for the service of others and the glory of God. The desires of the body are not destroyed, but they are controlled, harnessed; the power that would work harm to others is transformed into useful, godlike service.

Mrs. A. M. H., Grow, Okla. There is a very good old two-edged proverb which says: "Charity should begin at home—but it should not end there." In the passage in I Tim. 5: 4, which is often quoted in justification of home claims, it is not by any means intended that our benevolences should be restricted. "There is that scattereth and yet increaseth" (Prov. 11: 24), and a blessing is promised to the liberal heart. Charitable needs near at hand should not be neglected, however (see I Tim. 5: 8).

J. A. P., Pine Grove, Pa. The passages in Deut. 14: 21, 25, 26 are a part of the Jewish law forbidding the eating of unclean things. These and other passages in the same connection were specially directed against an annual pagan ceremony (see Exod. 23: 19 and 34: 26) in which, if they joined, they would be violating the law which Moses had laid down on this particular subject.

A. F. B., Mooresville, N. C. The girl who asked for the head of John the Baptist was Salome, daughter of Herodias. See Matt. 14: 6.

E. M., McCracken, Pa. The question of recognition in the future life is one that gives thought to a great many Christian people. They may draw comfort from the many passages in both the Old Testament and New Testament on the subject. David spoke with assurance of his dead son, when he said, "I shall go to him, but he will not return to me." (II Sam. 12 : 23.) See also Phil. 3 : 20; Heb. 12 : 1; Matt. 17 : 3; Rev. 6 : 9, 10; Rom. 14: 12; Luke 16 : 23; I Thess. 4 : 13-18; Heb. 13 : 17; Matt. 8 : 11; Eph. 3 : 15, which indicate the preservation of identity. Why should we doubt even for a moment that the redeemed will know each other? Surely their songs of redemption would have little meaning, if they rose from hearts that recalled nothing of the struggle and the victory. Heaven is the Christian's fatherland, where all will be at home, and it would be no home if all were strangers to each other.

Mrs. A. E. O., Hicksville, Ohio. 1. The passages in I Cor. 11 : 21-23 relate to a proper recognition of the dignity and solemnity of the Sacrament. It is not a festival of eating and drinking, an occasion for the indulgence of appetite, a carousal, but a sacred and tender remembrance, and the apostle reminds those who regard it in any other spirit than the right one that they are unworthy to sit down at the Lord's table. The "Love-feast" which was in vogue before the institution of the Lord's Supper had often been characterized by excesses. He warned them that such excesses, carried into the new Christian observance, made a true celebration of the solemn service impossible. 2. I Cor. 14 : 34, 35 doubtless had reference less to a general principle of universal application than to local conditions, which in his judgment called for a rebuke. There are evidences elsewhere that women were by no means unrecognized in their services to the early church. Modern commentators do not regard either of the instances under consideration as applicable to conditions today.

G. H., Grayville, Ill. David Livingstone, the famous missionary and explorer, died at Ilala, Central Africa, May 1, 1873. Stanley left him in 1872, having pleaded with him in vain to return to Europe. The minister's statement on the subject was substantially correct.

J. H. C., Minneapolis, Minn. While there are degrees of lying, some lies being worse than others, any intentional violation of truth is a lie before God. Lying in every form is condemned in Scripture, and the devil is indicated as the "father of lies." Nowhere does the Bible admit or justify lying, even where it may be done in a praiseworthy cause. On the other hand, there is no prohibition against silence, not, however, if silence should be the equivalent of or convey the same impression as a lie, but where silence is wise and expedient. In law, an untruthful statement is considered with regard to the element c or intent to do wrong that may have pı its utterance, rather than with regar the perversion of the truth; but in morals lies in both. There can be no har justifiable lying before God. Even e tions of speech, which may become conscious habit, are to be condemned kin to downright lying.

HANDS that are admired for their whiteness and smoothness generally belong to the woman who knows the value of Ivory Soap for household purposes as well as for bath and toilet.

She washes dishes with Ivory Soap. She does most of her laundry work with it. And she uses it for much of her general cleaning.

In her housework, as in her personal toilet, Ivory Soap enables her to avoid continual contact with strong suds which redden and roughen the skin faster than lotions can restore its natural color and smoothness.

At the same time, the purity and quality of Ivory make it cleanse even more thoroughly than alkaline soap. And as to cost, it is priced so low that the actual outlay for household soap is practically no greater where Ivory Soap is used than if the work were done with ordinary laundry soap.

What Mexico Needs

By Charles Stelzle

© Underwood & Underwood

[is brief survey by Mr. Stelzle, who has ent much time in Mexico, will give a hoful background in considering the sun ary of the news, which follows direct after the article.]

THERE were dogs everywhere. Mexicans are great on dogs! They aren't very particular about the breed so long as it's dog.

“ook out there!” I shouted to the chafeur; “don't run over the most misable dog in town. If we do, the l shoot us, sure thing!”

I was bad enough to have gone to Me o in an automobile—it attracted too nuch attention—but I was in a hur just then to get back to El Paso, an the chauffeur was taking speed libeies with his machine as we rode thr gh Juarez, for I didn't care to spe the night in Mexico with AmerIca erritory so close by.

Cildren were also sprawling everywh in the extremely narrow streets, an f we had injured a youngster on tha trip it would have been “good nig ” for us. We passed a corner, wh a few days before the soldiers ha oiled up corpses by the dozen and bu ed them in the sight of all those wh cared to look. Stray arms and leg nd heads were kicked back into the re as though they were chunks of wo . Blood ran in the streets of the cit The worst thing about war is wh it does to those who are left alive. It utalizes them and makes them callou to human suffering—it cannot be ot wise. After these Mexicans had wit ssed such sights why should they he ate about shooting down a miserabl “gringo” who ran over a pet dog? Th 's what was worrying me.

The adobe houses in which the Mexicans live look as though they had risen out of the earth upon which they stand. They are the same color, because they are made of the dirt of the roadside. Low and almost windowless, usually very dirty inside, with dirt of different varieties—some of which it would not be polite to talk about—outside, they are monotonous and uninviting. These houses are built of home-made blocks about one foot square and probably three inches thick. It isn't much of a trick to build a house of this kind, and there isn't much lost when it is blown up by the enemy. That is, the financial loss is not very great. What it means in the loss of stability of character and civilization is another story.

The reason why it would be extremely difficult to “conquer” the Mexicans is because most of them have no permanent abiding-place. They own neither houses nor lands, and they would just as soon live in the fastnesses of the mountains depending upon forages for food supplies, as to live in the average Mexican “town.” This probably is not true of the great mass of people, but it surely is true of large numbers of those who are fighting in the various armies. However, this is not an accurate picture of the fifteen millions of people who today live in Mexico, and it would be unjust to characterize the Mexicans as a nation of bandits or outlaws.

HERE is the case for the Mexicans: They have been robbed of the land which they profoundly believe belonged to them. Eighty per cent. of the people are peons, ten per cent. are Spanish aristocrats and Mexican land-owners of almost pure Spanish blood, while the remaining ten per cent. consist mainly of professional and small business men who are largely dominated by foreign ideas and foreign employers. The revolution in Mexico is purely a revolution of the people—the great mass of working people; it is largely a fight to gain control of the land—whatever other questions may be involved. There is practically no middle class in Mexico, although recent events and tendencies will undoubtedly help to develop this kind of a group.

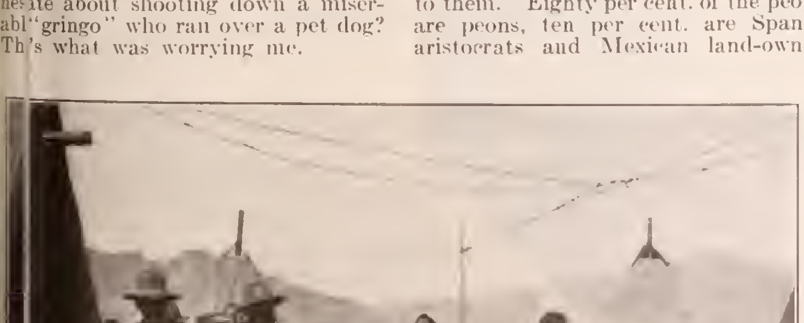
But suppose the United States should gain control or “intervene” in Mexico—what would happen? It would mean, undoubtedly, the restoration of “law and order,” but “law and order” to the average Mexican means simply the domination of the property-owning class which the Mexicans so ardently hate, and which they are trying to exterminate, so that they themselves may come into possession of the land.

What is needed most of all in Mexico is justice—justice administered by an enlightened Mexico, not by an outside force or agency. Mexico will, therefore, be compelled to solve her own problems—nobody else can do this for her, no matter how “disinterested” may be the motive or the method. It unquestionably is the duty of Uncle Sam to do what he can to restore order in this neighboring country, particularly if Americans are being sacrificed. But it is an open question as to what should be the attitude of our country in the settlement of Mexico's internal affairs.

I SAW many Mexican boys with limbs shot off and their faces badly bruised—victims of the Mexican revolution. One day at a sort of military reception Mexican soldiers on horseback were lined up ready to receive the guests of honor. It was interesting to study the soldiers on guard. Many of them were old men, but a considerable number were little fellows of fourteen. Two such little chaps, on guard, growing weary of standing beside their horses so steadily, began to play. A passing dog furnished amusement for them. They prodded him with their guns, and seemed greatly to enjoy the howls of the animal. There the Indian blood told! Presently tiring of this sport, they began to wrestle a bit, and to play other pranks. Soon an officer appeared upon the scene, but to my amazement he merely shook his head and spoke gently to them. I surely expected them to receive rather harsh treatment; but the officer, while a military man, understood boys!

SEVEN thousand families own practically all the arable land in Mexico. If the distribution were proportionately the same as it is in the United States, one million Mexican families would be in possession of titles to landed property. In Chihuahua (pronounced “che-wah-wah”) the center of the revolution in Northern Mexico, the Terrazas family owned nearly twenty million acres, which comprised nearly all the tillable soil of that state. In some cases vast tracts have been “sold” for about three-fifths of a cent an acre. It has been charged that the peons of Mexico are ignorant and weak, but what can one expect from a people whose history has been such as theirs? Peonage or a system of feudalism always breaks down character.

It must not be assumed that Mexico



Typical Mexicans who have been driven into refugee camps by the long-drawn-out revolution

An oven in front of a Mexican tent home on American soil is a barren country, incapable of development. It is possible to raise in Mexico all of the products grown in the United States, as well as those in central Africa and Ceylon. Mexico is well suited to agriculture, having both a temperate and a tropical climate, because much of the country is high above the sea level. Corn, wheat, coffee, and rubber are among the principal products. It is also a rich mining country, and has some of the largest deposits of petroleum in the world. Foreign commerce before the last revolution amounted to nearly $250,000,000. The mine output alone has reached about $90,000,000 annually. The agricultural and pastoral land is capable of taking care of at least three times its present population.

There is no doubt that Mexico will make progress even through the pitiful conditions which now confront it. The revolution of the past few years has given the great mass of the population a new insight into the world's affairs. In the first place, large numbers of Mexican soldiers have traveled extensively throughout Mexico. The people are reading and studying and thinking as they have never done before. The educated classes call themselves "Liberals," which means that in a general way they believe in God, but not in any church. But the fact that the people are thinking is, in itself, the most hopeful sign.

LARGE territories in Mexico have no church of any kind, and in many cases the only form of religion practiced is that of pagan rites by the uneducated masses. "Wherever our churches are kept open we find a larger interest than ever," recently said a missionary. "This field is decidedly more open than it was ten years ago, due to the current upheaval and change, as well as to the more general informing of the people through the public schools and the multiplication of newspapers and books. Our Bible classes are the largest we have ever had in thirteen years of experience. Most of the Liberals desire to see our work spread. They know we believe in education, in independence of thought and action, and have come to see that countries with an open Bible, a free Gospel and popular education are the most prosperous in the world."

There is no doubt, however, that it is necessary for the Protestant Church to adapt itself to the peculiar need of the Mexicans if it is to make real progress. The Mexicans are actually Orientals, with all the characteristics of such people. We must not try to force upon them those methods or customs which are purely Occidental in character. And this may apply to their forms of worship as well as to their processes of education. Much of that to which they have been accustomed in their old religious life has a distinct value. This should be retained and built upon. Certain liturgical forms of worship are peculiarly acceptable to such people. These are often more attractive than the unadorned services of many Protestant churches. The people of Latin America are very fond of music. Bands play in all their parks. Music is a part of their daily life. Church life in Mexico may be greatly enriched by the introduction of congregational singing, and by the furnishing of dignified spiritual hymns.

"Next"- in a Mexican refugee camp

Probably most important of all is the question of the right kind of leadership for Mexico in civil and social, in economic, political and religious life. Mexico has suffered grievously from the wrong kind of leadership. The dawn of a day of greater opportunities is near in Mexico, but if these opportunities are to be realized it will mean that men and women with a true missionary spirit will take their places alongside the Mexican people, to teach thei to lead them, to stand by them in eir fight for democracy, to demand ju ice for them, and finally to permit the so far as possible, to work out their wn salvation—even though they may ake mistakes, and even though the isk may be entered upon with fear nd trembling. For only as a people irn to help themselves will they ever ake real and substantial progress.

The Mysterious Sanussiyyah

Something About the Great Moslem Brotherhood W ch Plans World Conquest Behind Its Veil of Secrec

By GEORGE E. HOLT

Former American Vice-Consul-General to Morocco; Author of "Morocco the Bizarre," "Christian Trenches in Morocco," etc.

PROBABLY there is no Mohammedan leader who is given so frequent mention in the news press of the world as is the Sheikh Achmed es-Sanussi, head of the great Sanussiyyah Brotherhood founded by his grandfather, and now without question the most powerful Moslem organization in existence. And since the outbreak of the world war, the cable dispatches have made frequent mention of the mysterious and marvelous organization which he controls with truly Sultanic autocracy.

And mixed in with the news reports concerning the doings of the Sheikh Achmed and the Sanussiyyah, there may be just enough mention of some of the wonders of the Sanussiyyah to excite one's curiosity, but not enough to satisfy it. Mention, for example, of the fact that there are said to be two million names on the official rolls of the order in North Africa; mention of a great secret city somewhere in the Sahara Desert; mention of a vast "war chest" into which has streamed a river of taxes imposed by the Sheikh es-Sanussi upon every one of his followers.

Such things as these are apt to cause wonderment—and a desire for details.

IN order to understand the Sanussiyyah and its relation to world affairs, it is necessary to make at least a hasty survey of the Islamic organizations of North Africa—of all of which the Sanussiyyah is the largest, richest and most thoroughly organized. It is the only division of the army of Islam in Africa which is operated upon anything resembling modern efficiency methods. But though the others are individually less important, collectively they must be considered, particularly as constituting the background against which the mysterious Sanussiyyah has arisen.

There are in North Africa seven principal organizations, which number among their adherents practically every one of the 200,000,000 faithful in North Africa. Their territories spread from Morocco to Egypt, and south to the far side of the great desert and down the west coast to Sierra Leone. These, arranged in order of their foundation, are the Khaderiyya, the Shadhiliyya, the Tijaniyya, the Rajmaniyya, the Darkawiyya and the Sanussiyyah orders.

The oldest of these sects, the Khaderiyya, dates from the middle of the twelfth century, and its influence is confined to the western part of the Sudan.

The Shadhiliyya, founded a century later, is a powerful organization, itself having three large divisions—the Bakayiyya, which gives spiritual and political leaders to that desert district lying south of Morocco; the Shaikhiyya, which exerts a powerful influence upon southern Algeria; and the Hansaliyya, which is very influential among the people of the southern Atlas.

The Tijaniyya, dating from 1780 or 1781, is a very active organization, having as its field of influence that part of Africa lying between Senegal, Timbaktu and Sierra Leone.

A Sanussi Patrol

The Rajmaniyyah, founded a few years later, is one of the most influential and one of the biggest of modern fraternities, and is said to have fully one hundred monasteries in Algeria alone. The western Sudan is its stronghold.

At the end of the eighteenth century another Mohammedan order, the Darkawiyya, came into being, and has adherents in every part of nort est Africa. It raised jehad, or holy war, agains the French in 1888, but met with little success, p icipally because its fanaticism prevented intel ent cooperation and calm forethought.

Another order marked by its intolerance is t of the Madaniyyah, which was born in 1820 and ich centers in Tripoli. This organization gave—an till gives—strength to the native opposition to I ian rule in Tripoli. Its chiefs have always been, an ow are, in close touch not only with the Turkish one but with the leaders of other Mohammedan ers throughout the world.

And, most recent of all the North African Is mic orders, the Sanussiyyah.

This order was founded by one Mohamme en Ali ben es-Sanussi just after the beginni of the nineteenth century. Es-Sanussi had een a member of the ancient Khaderiyyal but grew discontented with its inactivity. He therefore set about the foundation an order which should be actively an rogressively militant in the interes of Islam, and which should have its goal the supremacy of Moslem r in Africa and in such other cou ries as had witnessed the victori of Christianity. The founder of th ew order went the way of all flesh but he left behind him the beginni of a powerful order whose ideal vas calculated to appeal to all Islam. his, coupled with the fact that its iefs have been men wise enough to arn the lessons of the Christian worl has made the Sanussiyyah what it is to .

Notable among its leaders was the Sl kh-el-Mahdi, who in the years 1885 to 90. through his great activity, gave much im tus to the Sanussiyyah movement throughout rth Africa, and his son, Achmed es-Sanussi, the pr ent head, who is chiefly responsible for the won ful organization of the brotherhood, for the great var chest," and for the secret city in the desert.

It has been said that there is no government the world in which the ruler of the Sanussiyyah do noi have a secret representative; that no act of impor nce to Islam is taken by any sovereign or legislative dy that news of it does not immediately start fo the "secret city" back beyond the border of the eat desert. That the Sheikh es-Sanussi has his ow epresentatives in European courts has been prov on more than one occasion, and who is to say that ere is not some one in Washington to whom runs o the invisible wires from the desert city? If th is no delegate of the Sanussiyyah here, to whom s a let addressed a few years ago which lies before me? Th letter is from "The Marabout-al-Majeed Sa ssi, of the Mosque of Kirwan, on the border-line of ipoli and Tunis," and it is addressed to certain M ammedans in the United States. I suspect that the were many more of its kind. It says:

> IN e name of the most merciful God, the compassionate King the day of judgment: Peace be upon all believers of the mer ul God and upon all true Moslems who bear the stamp of t right faith in the actions of supporting truth and justice mong the creations of God. This message is sent to you all m this holy temple so that you may know something abo the unjust act of the Italian government, who declared war gainst us for no other reason than to discredit the Mo mmedan faith by directing their powerful guns and soldier o fire and destroy the property and lives of the innocent peo of Tripoli. We have tried every method of kindness to c courage the spirit of this war, but the Lord God of Rome has lessed his soldiers and wished them good luck on the hun g expedition against the poor Moslems who had neither gun nor ammunition by which to defend themselves. We des you to refrain from doing business that would benefit the alian government, and we urge you to contribute as mu as you possibly can from your income to help us in this tro e of right against wrong. The Koran said, "All those foll ers of the faithful work of Islam, in fighting for their righ n the holy war, shall be rewarded with a place near the thr of God in the heaven which is built upon the river of swe water and perfumed air forever." Now, my brethren, we not prize your financial assistance more than your person appearance with us. Christians believe in fighting with mo , but undoubtedly Satan has to amuse himself at the exp c of those who follow his track. The Italians may dest y our bodies, but our spirits will some day spring out once more to teach them how to properly follow the spirit of the vine Messiah, the Son of Mary. The student of faith can t help but see the Italians marching away from the original aching of Saydena-Ayssa (Jesus the Son of Mary). Remer er, brethren, there is but one perfect faith, in which all the her faiths that existed before combined in the book of Kor . Modern Christians and Israelites were drifting away from he original teachings of their prophets, and with their wea and worldly tricks caused more damage to the principl of their own faith. The sparkling flame of their wealth strik the clouded mind of the ignorant with such force that it s fire to the garments of the thoughts of every creed and nati . May Allah forgive me if I should misjudge the spirit of h creatures. I am his humble slave and the servant of the nighty Allah.
> Marabout-Al-Majeed Sanussi.
> Kirwan, Africa

T E strength of the Sanussiyyah order today lies n four attributes. First. Its avowed aim of rest ing the power of Islam appeals deeply to the reli on and fanaticism of every Mussulman, whether he rich or poor, whether he be of the Sanussiyyah or er one of the great religious fraternities, whether he Moor, or Turk, or Chinaman, whether he live in icago or Tibet.

S ond. Its wealth, gathered from followers of eve walk of life, from the four corners of the earth, n oportion to their wealth or earnings. Every me er of the Sanussiyyah sends a definite percen ge of his earnings to the coffers of his fraternity. An hese contributions have been hoarded for years, an re being hoarded against the day which it is bel ed shall come—the day when Islam shall find the pportunity to strike.

T ird. Its vast and constantly growing membershi There are said to be, as I have stated, two milior of names on the membership rolls in the secret ity But there are millions of members in other par of the world than North Africa whose names are corded on the rolls maintained elsewhere, and na members who have been initiated but whose na s are on no record. It is estimated that the San iss yah order has nearly ten millions of initiated me ers.

F rth. Its progressiveness and conservatism— or Moslem organization.

A d yet a fifth important factor in the developne of this marvelous order must not be overlooked: the veil of secrecy surrounding it, a veil so impenetrable for the most part that only now and then, here and there, can one see what is going on behind it. And in order really to understand even a little, one must piece together, a little at a time, meager facts gleaned from widely separated places, at long intervals of time.

The head of this order, the Sheikh es-Sanussi, preserves the mystery of the order by himself being veiled. No one save his viziers may gaze upon his sacred person. And no Sultan ever ruled his viziers with a firmer hand than does this sovereign.

Under the viziers are the m'kadems, who are the chiefs of the order in their various districts—local governors, as it were. These officials in turn are served by a staff of subordinates, who keep them informed of all things of interest to the order. Once each year the m'kadems gather in the secret city, but what transpires there we can only guess at. One thing is certain: the taxes they have collected in their districts are then turned into the general treasury.

The location of this secret city, which bears the name of Jof, can be found on the map, but no Christian lives who can tell you how the road to it runs, for no Christian traveler has ever been there—or, at least, has ever returned thence.

IF you will take a large map of Africa, you will experience little difficulty in finding the Gulf of Sidra, on the coast of Tripoli. On this gulf you will find marked the town of Ben Ghazi. Now look southward over a distance representing half of a thousand miles, and—if your map is an accurate one—you will find a fuzzy spot, almost lost in the blank expanse of the Great Desert, marked Oasis of Kufra. The usual idea of an oasis is gained from pictures in school geographies: that of a few tired camels reaching the refreshing shade of a dozen palm-trees, among which a bubbling well gives drink to thirsty man and beast and life to a few blades of grass. But, as a matter of fact, the oasis of Kufra is about the size of Belgium; so there is no use imagining curiosity-filled travelers gazing across the desert through a telescope, spying upon the secret city of Jof. The city itself is as thoroughly lost in the great oasis as is the oasis in the vast expanse of the Sahara. Only camel-caravans may reach Kufra—and as these caravans are the caravans of followers of the Sheikh es-Sanussi, there is little danger of a Christian being accepted as a passenger for the oasis. And even were he able to reach the oasis, he would be no more able to pass the guardians of Jof than to walk alone across the trackless Sahara.

Jof may well be called the brain of Islam. To it are carried, through the nervous system of the Mohammedan world, the impressions which, reaching the brain, give rise to reactions. Here are conceived and worked out the extensive plans by which it is hoped some day to make the Crescent supreme. Here the great war-chests are kept which receive the endless stream of taxes from the Sanussiyyah membership, war-chests not only for actual warfare, but for the spread of Mohammedanism and the creed of the Sanussiyyah. The doctrines of Islam are making giant strides in Africa. Thousands upon thousands of mosques mark the local centers of the creed, and every Mohammedan is a missionary of his belief. From the war-chests of Jof comes money for this work.

There is good and sufficient reason to believe that in Jof factories for the manufacture of munitions of war are in constant operation, under the supervision of members of the Sanussiyyah who have been trained in the technical schools of Europe. Here, too, members of the order are trained in military discipline, and a standing army of thousands of men, and a great camel-corps, is always in readiness.

But it is not all military. The development of trade, cultivation of land, maintenance of order—these are some of the things which are being done under the direction of the head of the Sanussiyyah which mark him as an unusual man—as a man who does not let fanaticism blind him to the fact that peace has its weapons no less powerful than war; as a man who is shrewd enough to build for the future, slowly but persistently; in fact, as a man who is planning not a holy war against Christianity, but a Moslem kingdom which, as a first step, shall cover all Africa. He knows that before he can go into the enemy's country he must see that his own is united. The building of a firm union among the Mohammedan sects is a well-nigh hopeless task, but it is the task to which the Sheikh Achmed has set his hand.

And the Sanussiyyah brotherhood is drawing adherents from all other Mohammedan orders. Its missionaries are constantly working wherever there are Mussulmans. Probably no one except the Sheikh Achmed himself can tell of the ramifications of the order. There is little question but that the annual pilgrimages of various orders have become revival services in the interests of the Sanussiyyah; that the present leaders of the Aisawa and Hamadsha for example—which in former years drove the Christian from the streets of Tangier during the dance—are active missionaries of the Sanussiyyah, in close touch with the secret city.

It may be asked: has not the time arrived for the Sanussiyyah to take the field against the Cross?

I believe not. I believe that the Sheikh es-Sanussi is too wise a man to enter the present struggle. He is enemy of both sides; all the non-Islamic world he considers his enemy; must consider it so. Why then fight for either side to take the chance of his ally losing? And more, should his ally win, he must then take the field against a foe rendered powerful by success of arms.

No; I think that so long as this war shall last the Sheikh Achmed will confine his attentions to Africa, building his empire—the empire of Islam which, he hopes, shall some day come into its own. And that day may be when Europe, sickened by death, weakened by expense, shall recall its fragments of armies from the battle-ground. Could Islam do more injury to Europe than Europe is doing to herself?

YUAN DOFFS THE ERMINE. Press dispatches of March 17 and 22 indicated that three provinces of China were already in rebellion, and that two more important provinces were on the verge of joining in the movement against the monarchy: sixteen thousand republican troops were on the borders of one of the loyal provinces, and the Chinese government troops were making little headway in any direction. With this situation not to be gainsaid, Emperor-President Yuan Shi Kai on March 22 issued a mandate declaring that the revolution showed that the demand for a monarchy was not unanimous, and that, therefore, he would reject the crown and resume the presidency. The mandate said that the imperial documents would be returned to the state council, which would reconvene as the Senate preparatory to the resumption of the republic. Hsu Shih Chang, who was reported to have left the cabinet because of the creation of the empire, signed the mandate as secretary of state. The Chinese Republic Association of San Francisco said that if the news from Peking was true it would mean the end of the revolution. Later reports predict a popular outcry against the retention of Yuan at the head of the State.

THREE CITIES FIGHT FIRE. Paris, Texas, Nashville, Tenn., and Augusta, Ga., all reported disastrous fires on March 21 and 22. The loss at Paris was estimated to reach $5,000,000. Thirty blocks were destroyed, including the business district and 1,500 to 2,000 homes; about 15,000 people were rendered homeless. At Nashville a boy threw a burning ball of yarn into the dry grass of a vacant lot, and the resulting fire was not brought under control until it had swept over thirty-five residence blocks, destroying 600 houses with a loss of $1,500,000. At Augusta the fire started in the business section, and was carried by a high wind into the residence district, doing damage estimated in the neighborhood of $5,000,000.

POLISHING UP THE SWORD. The Army Bills in the House and Senate were taken up with renewed energy under the impetus of the Mexican crisis. The bill introduced by Chairman Hay of the House Committee on Military Affairs provides for an army of 140,000 men, 20,000 more than our present war strength, and the complete federalization of the militia. Various attempts to amend the bill to make it more nearly correspond with the bill pending in the Senate, which provides for a larger army, were defeated, although the Kahn amendment for an army of 220,000 was lost by only 22 votes. One amendment, permitting enlisted men to be transferred to the reserve on the recommendation of their superior officers at the end of one year's service, was incorporated in the bill. The bill reached a vote in the House on March 23, and was passed by a vote of 402 to 2. Amendments to the bill, which were finally adopted in addition to the one mentioned above, provide for the building up of the officers' corps by the instruction of cadets in military schools and colleges; for mobilization of resources for the manufacture of arms, munitions and special equipment in time of war; and for the listing for emergency uses of all plants in the country capable of making arms and those which can be transformed into munition plants. The bill will create a regular army of 140,000 men, with a reserve of 60,000, which the President would have authority to call to the colors without special action by Congress. The President would also have authority through the bill to increase the regular war strength from 140,000 to 175,000. The Senate on March 21 passed the bill for a government armor plate factory, and on the next day the House Naval Affairs Committee, which was considering the bill, was notified of a drop in price of armor plate by the Bethlehem Company from $420 to $390 a ton. A resolution was introduced into the Senate on April 22 by Senator Sherman of Illinois, authorizing the President to call 50,000 volunteers for service in Mexico. The resolution provides that preference shall be given to members of the organized militia, that the volunteers shall be held in service until peace and sound government have been established in Mexico, and that their operations shall be limited within the territorial limits of Mexico as an auxiliary to the forces of General Carranza. The resolution was laid on the table, to be called up later.

TO CONTINUE FEDERAL INSURANCE. There is a movement in Washington to continue for another two years the operation of the Federal War Risk Bureau, which expires by limitation in September. Up to date, the bureau has written for American shippers $110,000,000 insurance on war risks at sea. Premiums earned are $2,200,000, which has been more than sufficient to pay all losses.

JAPAN NOT IDLE. Japan is not waiting for the outcome of the world war to rearrange her relations, either internal or external. The people are dissatisfied with the present treaty with Great Britain because it is claimed that Japan is thereby prevented from taking her proper place of priority in China and the Far East. At a recent dinner of the Japan Trade Association, a prominent editor declared that the Anglo-Japanese alliance should be reframed to meet the changed situation in Japan in the exaltation of her position and influence in Far Eastern affairs. A part of the agitation is due to the fact that in Canada, Australia and other British colonies the Japanese are refused treatment on an equal footing with nationals of other countries. The law of Japan, until the present time, has held that Japanese had no right to forswear their nationality, and that children born of Japanese parents on foreign soil were still Japanese citizens. A new measure is now on its passage through the parliament of Japan, with every probability that it will become law, which grants to a foreign-born Japanese the option of choosing his nationality when he becomes of age. (This law will permit 25,000 children of Japanese parents in Hawaii and 3,000 born in the United States to become American citizens.) As a part of the plans to expand the trade of Japan, diplomatic relations have for the first time been established between Japan and Greece. The newly appointed chargé, Baron Otovi, was received in Athens on March 20.

THE PASSING OF THE OUTLAW. In the days following the war, the Younger brothers obtained a national reputation as outlaws in numerous daring raids in Missouri and neighboring states, exploits which found a prominent place in a certain type of fiction thirty years ago. The brothers were finally captured and imprisoned in Minnesota. On March 21, Cole Younger, the oldest and last of the family, died. He was paroled after serving twenty-five years of a life sentence in the Minnesota penitentiary, and returned to his home at Lees Summit, Mo., where he settled down after a short experience on the lecture platform. Three years ago he was converted, and since then has been an active worker in the church. On March 18 Jack Allen, the last of the Allen clan of Carroll County, Va., died, as have most of his clan, in a gun fight. For more than a generation the Allens defied the law, and the defiance reached its climax at the trial of Floyd Allen on March 14, 1912, when the clansmen opened fire on the court, killing the judge, the county prosecutor, the sheriff, a juror and a witness. Following this defiance of law, the Allen clan was vigorously followed up by the officers, and now, with the death of Jack Allen, the clan goes into oblivion along with the Youngers and the Jameses.

LIABILITY LAW CANNOT BE EVADED. A decision of great importance to labor was given by the appellate division of the supreme court of the state of New York on March 18. An employee of a railway company, injured in the course of his work, signed a release to the company, getting nothing in return, and applied for compensation under the state workmen's compensation law. The court held that the release did not operate to relieve the railway of the obligation for compensation provided for by law.

WHAT WILL THE HARVEST BE? It is estimated that in the four months remaining before the first of the next wheat crop is available for marketing, exports of wheat may reach 80,000,000 bushels. Taking that into consideration and figuring the average consumption and the wheat needed for spring sowing, it is probable that there will be 150,000,000 to 200,000,000 bushels of last year's crop of wheat still in storage at the beginning of the new harvest. The United States government reports show that acreage of winter wheat planted last fall was 11¼ per cent. less than the acreage planted in 1914. It is hardly possible that the spring wheat acreage can be increased sufficiently to make up for the decrease in winter wheat. The expectation, therefore, is that this will not be a record year.

ANOTHER PAN-AMERICAN FAIR. In the early days of the eighteenth century the Franciscan friars came out of Mexico with the sword in one hand and the Bible in the other, working their way northward to convert the Indian tribes in the great plains above the Rio Grande. In 1718 they established the miss n of San Antonio, around which has g own up the Texas city of that name. San Antonio proposes to hold an expo ion in 1918 in celebration of its two undredth birthday. The expositio will be a pan-American exposition, pl ned to promote closer social and comm cial relations between the United tes and its Latin American neig rs, especially Mexico and the C tral American republics. This expo ion does not ask the government fo any other backing than its endorse nt. Texas intends to pay the bills. A solution is now pending in Co ess authorizing the President to invi the participation of the Latin Am can governments in the exposition.

REDRAFTING OUR SEA LAWS. re-tary of State Lansing returned to shington on March 23 after a two ks' vacation in North Carolina ing which he gave careful study to t intricate problems involved in th ubmarine-armed ship question. I was determined before he left Washi ton that the United States must take me pronounced stand on these que ns, and the conclusions reached by th Secretary will be laid before the Pre ent and the cabinet preparatory to a m norandum to all foreign governme on the subject.

THE RELATION OF THE RAILWA TO THE NATION. In a recent address ore the Master Builders' Associati of Boston, Mr Howard Elliott, pre ent of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, gave some int esting figures. He said there were ap oximately 1,800,000 employed in th ailway service of the United States; hat if you allowed five persons to eac employee that would mean 9,000,00 persons dependent directly upon th ailways for their living. There are a east a million workers in coal mines rail mills, car shops and other ind rial plants directly dependent upon ra vay operation, which represent a her 5,000,000 people. There are prob y a million and a half owners of the sec ties of American railways, which, if fi red at four to one, would mean an addi nal 6,000,000 people. By this compil on, it is shown that at least 20,0 000 out of our population of 100,0 000 are directly interested financially the wélfare of the railways. In ad on, insurance companies hold a billio and a half in railway securities, the ompanies representing 30,000,000 p cyholders, and the savings banks the country have $800,000,000 inves in railway securities, the banks ing about 11,000,000 depositors, whic dds another 41,000,000 people to the already interested in railways. T ing into account possible duplication, appears probable that at least ha the people in the United States are her directly or indirectly interested the earning power of American railw s.

NICARAGUA'S FINANCES. Upo the downfall of the dictator Zelaya, th new government of Nicaragua aske the advice and assistance of the U ted States in the settlement and pa ent of its floating debt. Claims for ore than $6,000,000 were then being p sed by citizens of foreign governmen A commission of three members w appointed by the two governments sift all these claims, and after three ye s of investigation of 7,908 accounts, am unting to $13,808,161, claims to the a unt of $1,840,432 were allowed. In Oc ber, 1913, Nicaragua agreed to pay 2 per cent. of the net customs revenue the claims commission, to be applied the judgments allowed. Between Oc ber, 1913, and February, 1914, $58,54 was so paid, being applied mostly t the judgments of small claimants. C y 4 per cent. of the claims allowed we for foreigners, other than American the citizens of Germany, Great Britain, and Italy being advised by their consuls not to submit their claims to the commission. These claims were taken up by the ambassadors of the three governments with the Secretary of State at Washington, and the governments concerned were asked to be patient, and to give Nicaragua time. The European War has since intervened, and no further diplomatic action has been taken. The unbonded floating debt of Nicaragua represents claims to a gross value of about $9,000,000. Nicaragua's income is only $2,000,000 a year, which is scarcely sufficient to meet current expenses. The payment of $3,000,000 authorized by the Nicaraguan Canal Treaty will help toward the clearing up of this financial problem. The question also who is to pay the balance and how it is to be done is sure to arise whenever the chancellors abroad once more have time to apply themselves to purely commercial matters.

For Inoculation Against War. In an address at a banquet given in his honor by the New York Merchants' Association, Ambassador Morgenthau, after telling some of the horrors of war which he had seen, said: "There is one thing that I want to bring home to you—that here in this country we take active steps to prevent yellow fever, smallpox and other infectious diseases from spreading. But this war fever that is traveling through Europe—that is the thing we are in danger of being infected with. We ought to inoculate ourselves with the serum of sanity and sobriety." The Turkish government was so well pleased with the ambassador's work that he was asked to become Turkish minister of commerce and agriculture while still retaining his ambassadorship.

An "American" at Last Defined. It has long been a debatable question what constitutes a real American. Some insist that only those are Americans whose ancestors lived on American soil before the Revolutionary War. Some insist that when a naturalized citizen takes out his final papers, he is an American. There are those who try to maintain that to be an American one must be an unadulterated member of one of the Indian tribes that were on this continent when it was discovered. Still others say that he must be a Republican. Some even assert that no man is an American citizen who is not a Presbyterian. But we cannot give all the claims that are made. It has remained for the New York Times to say the last word on this subject. Speaking of the death of Henry James, the novelist who long ago made his home in England and but a few months before his death renounced American citizenship and became a subject of the British crown, the Times editorially says, "He was never more loyal to American traditions and principles than when he became a British subject." We leave this clear-cut definition of an American just there. We dare not comment on it lest we cloud its brilliance, as one's irreverent breath momentarily bedews a diamond. The utmost that we will attempt is slightly to recast the statement so as to make it of universal application and thus give to the world in final form the definition of an American in these words: A citizen of the United States is never more loyal to American traditions and principles than when he becomes a British subject.

Shackleton Marooned in Antarctic. Wireless messages received at Melbourne, Australia, March 25, said that the auxiliary ship Aurora, which had been waiting in Ross Sea to bring the Shackleton expedition back to civilization had been caught in the drift ice during a severe hurricane, dragged from her anchorage and carried some 500 miles, and that she was then proceeding to Port Chalmers, New Zealand, with a jury rudder, with no anchors, and short of fuel. Lieutenant MacKintosh and some eight or ten of the crew of the Aurora were ashore and were left behind. It will now be impossible to rescue the Shackleton party before November, and it is highly improbable that any news will be received from the party in the meantime.

Will Not Disarm Ships. On March 24 all of the Entente powers were reported from Washington to have handed to Secretary Lansing formal responses rejecting his proposal that they disarm their merchant ships. No indication was given at the State Department as to what the next step of the United States government will be. It was reported on the 22d that the English and French reply to the American note regarding the British blockade, which has been expected for the last six weeks, had been again delayed. In the meantime, while we await the interference with our commerce continues.

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

DURING the week the Austro-Italian front became more animated. This activity opened with an Italian infantry attack March 18 on the Podgoro and San Michele Austrian defenses, accompanied by a heavy bombardment of the rear of the Isonzo River front. This attack was continued all Saturday and Sunday, and gradually spread to the west until all the front from one end to the other was active by Sunday evening. On Monday the Austrians got the upper hand for a time and at Podgoro, at San Michele and at Tolmino succeeding in driving out the Italians and in installing themselves in their places. The Italians, little daunted, the next day counter attacked ferociously but with little success, except at San Michele, where they succeeded in recapturing a portion of their lost trenches.

After this the line regained its habitual calm and continued therein for the rest of the week. The casualties were heavy. Looking back over the course of the campaign for the last three months on the Austro-Italian line it appears as though the Austrians were slowly gaining and have succeeded in winning back from the Italians a not inconsiderable portion of the ground which the latter won in the first three months of the war. There is nothing, however, to indicate as yet at all events, that the Austrians contemplate a general offensive on this front this spring.

There have been a number of skirmishes north of Salonica between outposts of the Allies and the Germans and Bulgarians during the week, which while very unimportant in themselves may perhaps be taken as indicative of much greater activity to come.

The British on March 18 completed the clearing up of the western border of Egypt and drove the Arab irregulars well to the southwest, inflicting considerable loss on them, and among other things retaking some ninety members of the crew of a British ship which was wrecked on this coast a year ago, and who had since been held as prisoners by the Sanussi.

On the sea, a minor engagement took place off the Belgian coast between two flotillas of British and German torpedo boat destroyers, which was apparently indecisive. The Austrian hospital ship Eleektra was sunk by a submarine off the Dalmatian coast with slight casualties. The activities of the submarines appear to be greatly increasing, a number of ships being reported sunk by them in the past week, neutrals being as usual among the victims.

On March 24 the channel liner Sussex was seriously damaged by an explosion which tore open the bow of the vessel and killed a number of people, injuring others. A number of Americans were aboard but at last reports the casualties and the nationality of those injured had not been definitely ascertained, being estimated at from 50 to 80. Officers of the vessel and passengers claim that the ship was torpedoed without warning, although it has not been definitely established whether she struck a mine or was torpedoed as claimed. American ambassadors at Paris and London are making a thorough investigation. There is no evidence from the dispatches to show whether the Sussex did or did not carry armament.

There are prospects of a serious row in the German Reichstag over the resignation of Admiral von Tirpitz, which resignation a large number of Germans seem to consider involves the abandonment of a militant campaign by the submarines, which militant campaign, against the British at least a large section of German public opinion not only endorses but demands.

It turns out that the report that Brazil had seized the German ships which had taken refuge in her various ports, is untrue. Brazil has not only not seized these ships but has issued a proclamation of neutrality in the war between Germany and Portugal.

The heavy purchases of war materials in the United States for the last year by Spain are at last beginning to attract attention and to arouse considerable curiosity. No nation spends large sums for the purchase of this class of supplies, without an offensive or defensive object in view.

Greece has proclaimed the annexation of Northern Epirus in Albania, which act seems to be causing concern in the official circles of Italy, France and Great Britain, particularly of Italy, which had designs on this portion of southern Albania herself.

Great activity has been manifested by the Russians on that portion of the eastern front in Europe which begins at Kemmern to the west of Riga and near the Gulf of the same name, and thence runs eastwardly and a little south to the Duna River which it follows a little to the west of the westerly bank of this stream through Friedrichstadt to Lake Naroez and to Shodsishky.

The rest of this eastern front was quiet as far south as eastern Galicia, but there the Russians won the most considerable advantage they have gained for several

Clear the Pathway

WITH the coming of spring, peace rumors multiply. Very agreeable reading they make in the newspapers, to those who are longing and praying for an end of the war, but closer examination shows that they have only a very slender foundation. A line in a speech of Premier Asquith; a single optimistic sentence of M. Ribot, the finance minister of France, to the effect that "it is permissible, without boasting, to perceive the end of this horrible war"; an expression by some one on the Stock Exchange or some trade magnate these constitute pretty nearly the entire basis of the current peace talk to which the press has given so much prominence. Nevertheless, peace is in the air. Correspondents with vivid imaginations choose it as a leading theme, and even discuss the terms which they believe may form the basis of settlement. But the oracles who alone can speak with authority are still dumb. No potential word comes from any European capital to set hope aflame. Rhetorical utterances, however much they may cheer us, count for little. The opinion of this or that banker, or exporter, or trade magnate, is usually colored by his financial interests and business desires. Peace does not come uninvited, and the invitation must have the voice of authority.

But the pathway to peace can be made easier by the neutral nations. Whether it fall to us to play an active part in the negotiations or not, we owe it to ourselves to be in readiness to aid in the restoration of world-peace when the hour strikes. It may be nearer than we think. Soon there may be an opportunity for the neutral nations to offer their services. Affairs have reached a point in the war where it becomes increasingly evident that there can be no justification on the part of any of the combatant powers for continuing the ghastly sacrifice of human lives at a rate which threatens the permanent physical impairment of the populations of Europe and the supremacy of the white race. For the sake of humanity, and to avert a still more appalling catastrophe, it is the duty of the neutrals now to employ every legitimate means to advance peace measures. The combatant nations are tired of the long and bloody struggle, and it is a reasonable assumption that they would welcome any sincere offer of services. In this duty the United States should take the initiative now. We should not wait until, as some have suggested, one or the other of the struggling powers is "ground into the dust." Such a proposition fills the soul with horror and repulsion, and disgraces what little of civilization is left. Victory at such a cost would be a savage triumph—too dear and too frightful to be considered.

The Laborer and the Lord

ATTENTION has been called to a strange expression in one of the press dispatches about the recent death of Cardinal Gotti: "His father was a dock laborer, but his mother was devoutly religious."

The New York Call, commenting upon this remark, declares that this expresses, in a subtle and unexpected way, an actual conviction of religious people generally that the laboring man can hardly be expected to be religious.

If any such notion as this does indeed exist in any quarter of the church, it means that to just that extent the church has broken away from the teaching, the example and the spirit of her Lord. Her founder a Carpenter, her original college a group of fishermen and their friends, the church of Jesus Christ, if it exists for any class on earth, exists for those who toil.

It is one of the most grievous faults of the church that she has so often misunderstood and neglected and alienated the laborers. There is scarcely a minister or congregation who would not at least profess to be shocked by such a blunt expression as that quoted above. They would all declare, "Why, of course, a dock laborer can be devoutly religious." But what are these ministers and congregations doing to make the dock laborers religious? What are they doing to make the dock laborers and their friends believe that the church is their ally, their comrade and their friend?

St. Paul making tents, Brother Lawrence working in his kitchen, Carey making shoes, Corvosso a busy farmer, Moody a boot salesman—in many lives like these the church of Jesus has shown again and again the value of men who toil. Think of the love and devotion that have gone into the building of the churches and cathedrals, the making of Bibles and hymnals, the thousand and one forms of humble drudgery that have made possible the church's great work. And is the church to have no word of hope, no assurance of sympathy, no promise of aid to the world's vast host of the workers?

It is to the reproach of the church that she has allowed society to oppress and wrong the workers. The industrial system of this day and other days hardly gives the worker time to think and pray. He is hurried and burdened and drained of his strength and his life. He is harried and exploited and plundered, and when the kings and priests and councilors, the bankers and the traders cannot agree, he is sent to the battlefields to settle their quarrels with his life-blood.

The God of Israel and the Christ of the New Testament plead the cause of the poor; they champion the worker; they call him to freedom, to life, to holiness, to joy and hope. If the church is to survive she must bow her will to these divine decrees, and set herself to the task of saving and serving the man who toils. We have so emphasized the last part of Christ's ineffable invitation that we have forgotten its beginning: "Come unto me, all ye that labor!"

The Bible and the City

A CENTURY ago Mayor Radcliff, of the City of New York, presided over a meeting in the city hall, at which the American Bible Society was formally launched on its great and splendid career. On May 13 of the present year a celebration of this event will be held in the present city hall, during the centennial exercises about to be held.

Mayor Mitchel made a wise decision in allowing the use of the city hall for this purpose. It is a good thing to remind the people that there should be a close tie between the city and the Bible. In the old days that was recognized. Many of our cities in the New World felt their dependence upon the old Book. They not only used it for the taking of oaths in their courts, but they knew that the safety of the city lay in the keeping of God's law. These hundred years have seen many changes, not the best of which has been the drift of cities and states away from the old Book.

The spectacle of a great Bible society holding its anniversary in the city hall of America's greatest city ought to stir up some wholesome thoughts and feelings. Our Catholic brethren should not be offended by the episode. Mayor Mitchel is a Catholic, but is glad to recognize the value of this society's work in opening the Bible for all lands. Not even the Jews, of whom there are such multitudes in New York, should object. The circulation of the Christian's Bible is doing more than any other agency to keep the world familiar with Jewish history and to keep fresh and strong the ancient Jewish ideals and prophecies.

The city and the Bible! The cities of our land should bring the Bible back into their life. To care for the poor, to fear God, to practice justice—the safety of our cities lies here. Beware lest we forget! "Unless the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain."

Have You Remembered Them ?

ONE of the saddest results of the European conflict has been the plunging of innumerable families in all the countries involved into penury, through the loss of their natural providers and protectors. An eminent French statistician has recently estimated that there are in that country alone 800,000 little children who have been made fatherless by the war up to March 20. To this must be added the uncounted multitudes of war orphans in Belgium, Poland, Germany, Austria, Bulgaria, Russia, Turkey, Italy, Serbia and England, of whom no census has been made. With these figures as a basis, we are probably well within the mark in placing the grand total of war orphans and widows at considerably over 4,000,000 souls.

Every day increases the number of those who become objects of charity. Doubtless, when the great struggle ends, arrangements will be made by the different governments to provide for these unfortunates; but meanwhile many of them must perish of want unless they are helped from other sources. There are funds for the sick and wounded soldiers, funds for sending comforts to the men in the trenches, funds for medical supplies and for forwarding souvenirs from sympathizing friends, but as far as we know, the only fund which is exclusively devoted to the succor of the widows and orphans is that of the Christian Herald Incalculable good has been done by our eleven relief committees in the various countries up to the present time, but the task still before them is a tremendous one. Further, it is a work of great urgency. Every reader of this journal who helps promptly and generously will be aiding in the a omplishment of one of the most worthy and hu ane enterprises in connection with the war—one wh h is not calculated to prolong the struggle, as it eals wholly with helpless noncombatants. If you ha not done so already, send in your gift to the Chr ian Herald War Widows and Orphans Fund w out delay.

False Education

THOSE who are so energetically advo ting the militarizing of our schools and c eges would do well to consider how the ame problem has worked out in Europe. n a recent occasion Dr. Karl Liebknecht, the well-k own socialist, in a rousing speech in the German R chstag drew a vivid picture of the results of conv ting the schools into military academies. "Edu tion under such a system," he said, "simply stren hens militarism and capitalism. You act as if you w h to throw open to the people the road to educatio , but that is only because capitalism requires sc lers. The schools are converted into training stab for war. You educate your children to be war mac nes. The present war has a demoralizing and b eful effect on education." What is true of Germa , or indeed of any part of Europe, may be reasonal expected to prove true of America. A note of w ning on this line was sounded by Amos Pinchot in a cent speech in New York: "Nations, like men," h aid, "are generally aggressive and quarrelsome in p portion to their fear that they will be oppressed b heir neighbors, or not given their just rights, unles hey can show fight. This state of narrow nationali , of distrust, of fear and hatred toward other p ples, urged by the militarists, will assert itself in o national life. It will demand an abatement of dem acy in favor of a higher organized autocratic effi ncy, ostensibly for military purposes, but really t keep the people under. Universal military train g is designed to make the people more subservient the present industrial system." There is more ruth than poetry in this, and a significant point abo it is that our industrial magnates are today forem t in the ranks of the advocates of militarism, favo ng a large army and navy, whose forces, they sh vdly foresee, would be devoted to the maintenance o heir special interests above all others.

A "Peace Scare"

> Yesterday, between 2 and 3 in the afternoon, this intry had an experience unique in the memory or history man. In the closing hours of the New York Stock Exchang had a "peace scare." Not only war stocks, but also s dard securities like Reading, Canadian Pacific, Tobacco and merican Woolens, dropped from one to three points. Th vorld was informed that with our whole industrial power had bet upon a long war, and we are now afraid we might se.
> The "peace scare" has passed. The news which wou have lifted the heavy load from a hundred million hearts w false. The Stock Exchange breathes free again.

If, on the strength of a mere unfounded ru or of peace, the New York Stock Exchange na owly missed a panic, what will happen when the tual news of peace comes, as it must come som lay? What a tremendous tumble there will be amo the "War Baby" stocks! With a great majority our 100,000,000 population praying and hopin and looking for peace, is it not disgraceful that th mere hint of coming peace should cause such a tem st as it did? Does it not indicate clearly that the is a strong, influential body of men who are intere d in keeping up the war, who have been working d and night to keep the stream of munitions pourin into the battlefields, bringing death to thousan and sorrow and suffering to multitudes, in order th the combination might continue to grow richer t ough Europe's tragedies? Big interests have boom the war stocks to an altitude that has attracted the speculative fraternity, and it will be strange deed if thousands of the moths and butterflies do n get badly singed when the climax comes.

Nowhere has the temper of the nation ward the munitions traffic found more vigorous exp ssion than in the debate in the United States Sen e on Tuesday, March 21, when the bill providing r an $11,000,000 government-owned and operated ava armor plant was passed by 58 to 23. There as a quick clashing of forces, the senators favorable th steel interests vainly striving to check the rising or which threatened to demolish their big ney-m ing combination. It was a time for some plain sp king. The combination which includes the B lehem, Carnegie and Midvale companies was de ared to be the most arrogant and iniquitous of all. T vote in the Senate may be regarded as an indica on of the growing public hostility toward other m ufacturing combinations which have held the go rnment at their mercy.

ever has the spirit of the nation responded with re enthusiasm to the propaganda of the militarists. W h the spring there have come wise counsels and th ghts of peace. Congress has evidently made up it nind to make the manufacture of armor and munit s a government undertaking, and to totally elimin e the whole disgraceful system under which huge pr its have been made by a group of greedy capita ts and manufacturers, and which has plunged te of thousands of citizens into the vilest "getri -quick" game that has ever disgraced the records of nancial speculation.

Cutting Down the Decalogue

IT is an iconoclastic age. Probably in nothing has this been shown so markedly as in the attempts to break up the old faiths and to shatter the old beliefs. Even the Bible itself has underg more tinkering in the last fifty years than in half a ore of the centuries preceding. Consequently it exci little surprise to learn that at the approaching tr nial convention of the Protestant Episcopal C rch in St. Louis, several months hence, a propositi is to be submitted to shorten the Decalogue in the ca hism and in the communion service. The Ten C mandments, as they were handed down by Moses, th great law-giver, amid the thunders of Sinai, have st d the test of world-service. They are today used in blic worship throughout the churches of Christendc and are still held as an incomparable presentation of e relations between God and man and man and hi ellowmen. In all likelihood there will never be a riod in the life of the world when they will cease to e so regarded.

ut while a shortened Decalogue may be adopted by ur Episcopal brethren as far as the communion se ice is concerned, it is hardly probable that it will be bbreviated in the catechism. In the sixteenth ce ury the Church of England recited only the prece s without the explanatory passages at communi , and some modern revisers have followed this ex nple in the prayer-books. It is argued by the ad cates of a shortened Decalogue that Jesus himse on various occasions, gave an example of the ab eviated method in his ministry, as shown in M k 10: 19; 12, 29, 30, 31 and Luke 18, 20. These pa ages, however, can only be regarded as incidental re erences to the Decalogue itself, teaching the spirit ra er than the letter of the law. The abbreviation sa to be proposed for the consideration of the Episcopa Convention will be approximately in the following fo :

> Thou shalt have no other gods before me.
> Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain.
> Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy.
> Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work.
> Honor thy father and thy mother.
> Thou shalt not kill.
> Thou shalt not commit adultery.
> Thou shalt not steal.
> Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor.
> Thou shalt not covet anything that is thy neighbor's.

is believed that there are many conservative ch chmen who will stand by the old law, in the or inal form in which it has been known ever since th establishment of the episcopacy. Since that day w n, as recorded in Exodus 20, "God spake all these w ds," not a syllable has been taken away from the co mandments, which have come down to us in their or inal form, "exceeding broad" in scope and spiritu ty. Prayer-books may be rewritten and even the C d may be revised; but the Decalogue of the Bible sh ld stand side by side with the Lord's Prayer and th Sermon on the Mount in the original form, and as uch to be held sacred. No human pen, however gi d, can improve upon them.

The Mind and the Lamp

IT has long been an open question whether night or day is most conducive to satisfactory study; whether the mind operates more freely when the senses are all alert, in the busy hours of daylight, w its sights, sounds and disturbances, or during th quiet night hours, when the faculties can be conce rated, and when the imagination is freest. Many no d brain workers have testified that night study gi s the best results. Writers have found that c position flowed more readily and smoothly under l lamp-light, and that ideas were less trammeled u constructive powers energized; although they a itted that what was produced at night was gener- al improved by a daylight revision. It is a strange th g, this angle of the senses which is changed so m erially by the influence of solitude. Scott, who was ex emely methodical, wrote most of his novels in the e y morning, after daylight, and others have had a si lar experience. But the charm of solitude attracts n t. Lew Wallace is said to have written the greater p of "Ben Hur" by the light of his lamp. Longf ew, too, was one of those who toiled "upward t ugh the night," while all the world was sound asleep.

Professor Alexander Graham Bell, the inventor of the telephone, said lately that for forty years his retiring hour had been from three to four A.M. He preferred to do his thinking when the world was asleep, and felt that he was always able to do better work in the three hours after midnight than at any other time. So with Edison, whose night vigils in his laboratory have always been the most productive.

There is a witchery in the spell which night casts over the senses, quickening the fancy, stimulating the creative powers of the brain, and idealizing everything in a way that recalls the lines of the poet who welcomed the night with a song, as it revealed to him all the wonder and fascination the day had hidden.

The Peace Within

CAN our hearts be full of peace while the world is full of war? We often wonder how the men who are conducting this vast carnage can sleep at night. The generals in their tents, the war secretaries or chancellors in their bedrooms, planning by day campaigns that mean wounds and death and widespread desolations, lie down at night to sleep. If they could not sleep they must abandon their work. The fighting men themselves sleep from sheer physical exhaustion.

This is the power to keep mental peace. But a still deeper and more precious peace is available. Whether it can be available for those continuing and conducting the war does not concern us now. But we, at this greater distance—we, if our skirts are altogether free from any stain of the distant bloodshed—we, while waiting and praying and longing for a peace that shall embrace all mankind, may and must have God's infinite deep peace in our own spirits. Deep must call to deep. Far below all the agitations and clamors of earth, there must abide the peace that Jesus had when he walked through a pain-racked world.

Some human problems only God's peace can answer; some human needs only God's peace can meet. To gain that soul rest, that soul poise, that soul calmness —this is the greatest need of every life. To remove the terrors and chagrins of sins long past; to give victory over present temptations; to give triumph in present trials; to give vigor for present and future tasks; to give a hope that shall make life not only tolerable but exultant—for these ends we need God's peace.

It will be a beautiful thing when peace settles down upon the world again. But even peace between the nations is not earth's highest goal, nor peace between man and man; but peace between each soul and God. That is God's dream. That it is for which Jesus died. And the beginnings of that vaster peace every one of us may grasp here and now. Nay, it is God's peace that shall grasp us, and hold us, and sustain us, come what may. And from our souls and our lips shall go forth to others the call to God's peace and the promise of it. "The Lord will bless his people with peace." As souls, as nations, as worlds, become his indeed, they shall find that promise true.

Newspaper Clippings

ON the first page of a New York evening newspaper two articles appeared the other day separated from each other by a single column. Each throws light upon and interprets the other. Quotations from both articles placed side by side will produce serious thinking, deep emotion, and, perhaps, some action.

From the first article:

> With orders aggregating 4,000,000 tons, valued at $240,000,000, placed in the steel market since January 1, the crest of the boom has not yet been reached, according to statements made here today by leaders in the industry. Orders placed in the last two months indicate profits to the mills of $80,000,000, half of which is expected to flow into the coffers of the United States Steel Corporation. Even this tremendous tide of prosperity, it is declared, will be surpassed before the close of the year. It is pointed out that prices have advanced $5 and $10 since New Year's day [this statement appeared on February 29] and further advances are looked for soon which will eclipse the record of 1899 and 1900.

After stating that much of this increased activity has been caused by plans for railroad equipment and shipbuilding, the report continues:

> It is estimated that forty per cent. of the export steel sales have been for the manufacture of war munitions in Europe. Heavy sales have been made to domestic manufacturers of shrapnel and high explosive shells. February's sales of war munitions are calculated at 350,000 tons for direct export, and total war sales since January 1 at 600,004 tons.
> One indication of the mighty effect of the European war on the steel industry is shown in figures presented by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, which declares that the total foreign shipments in 1915 were 3,513,453, an increase of twenty-five per cent. over the previous maximum of 1913, and almost 135 per cent. greater than the export of 1914.

The second article:

> While indescribable slaughter continues about the ruins of Fort Douaumont, the Teutons are feeling out the French line along a 100-mile front with artillery poundings and infantry attacks. There is every indication that the whole western front may suddenly burst into the flame of a struggle baffling imagination.

A paragraph further down the column refers to "the need of bringing up fresh reserves to take the place of the regiments blotted out in the first week of fighting."

A French soldier who reached Paris, wounded, after the first fighting at Verdun, said:

> I fought since the beginning of the war. I saw the shambles at Suippes and Soubain. The enemy advanced and were retired under orders, but we killed them by the dozen. As their battalions advanced upon us they were serried masses by files of twenty. The shrapnel from our seventy-five millimeter guns and the projectiles from our heavy artillery fell among them and you could see the great gaps, as if a mower had passed with a scythe. The high explosive shells which burst on contact fell, and limbs shot into the air. We were so close that pieces of torn flesh fell among us. From behind us the French artillery fired into the German masses, the German shells flying over our heads toward the Douaumont section. Then our machine guns, placed in batteries every five yards, began to play, and we saw the dead in groups upright, where there was not room to fall.

A few quotations from the morning paper of the same day make these evening pictures more vivid. Another soldier is speaking:

> There must have been 5,000 in the ravine and perhaps 25,000 in the wood. As the former reached the plateau a single shell burst right among them, flinging pieces in all directions. The front was enveloped in a storm of shells, fragments of men, and lumps of earth. Soon the ravine was choked with bodies. Remember too, it has been snowing. [This adds clearness to the picture. White and red make a striking color effect.] Others tried to clamber over and kept rolling down the hillside. The heaps of dead gave us a more effective barricade than our own entrenchments. They simply could not pass. I would never have believed that human beings could face such a terrific fire. Yet they knew it was certain death, for the wounded were stifled under corpses or torn in pieces by fresh shells.

We wonder if those who are reaping the profits from the new American industry of munitions-making have pleasant dreams at night; what fancies steal upon them as they caress their children, and what visions come before their eyes when they try to pray!

To Lovers of Good Music

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has a pleasant surprise in store for its readers, especially for those who are lovers of good music. Several months ago we communicated with a number of the best known composers of sacred music here and abroad, with a view to enlisting their talent for the production of a line of new compositions suited to the church or the home. The effort has been wonderfully successful. A gratifying number of composers accepted the proposition and were supplied with words of hymns, sacred songs, etc., which had never before been set to music. We have now a list of fourteen new compositions, all of which will appear in the pages of the Christian Herald. The titles of the pieces now ready for production are as follows:

"Easter Morning." Composer, Russell Hancock Miles.
"Upon His Throne." Composer, Carrie B. Adams.
"The Ascension." Composer, Gordon H. Johnson.
"Go Ye Into All the World." Composer, J. B. Herbert.
"The Angel at the Gate." Composer, Charles H. Gabriel, Jr.
"Guiding Stars." Composer, Powell G. Fithian.
"Why Should I Fear?" Composer, A. B. Morton.
"Tomorrow." Composer, S. W. Beazley.
"The Great Republic." Composer, J. S. Fearis.
"Lead Me." Composer, Robert Harkness.
"Morning Hymn." Composer, Charles H. Marsh.
"Light of the Years." Composer E. O. Sellers.
"A Mother's Carol." Composer, W. E. M. Hackleman.
"The New Land." Composer, C. Harold Lowden.

These compositions were submitted, with a number of others, to four competent judges who passed upon their merits. This committee of judges included Professor Karl P. Harrington, the well-known musical authority; Mr W. J. Lerman, musical critic of the Tullar-Meredith Company; Benjamin Franklin Butts, evangelist, hymn-writer and composer, and Mr. Hubert P. Main, the author of many well-known hymns. Only those pieces which were specially meritorious were accepted. The result was the selection of the fourteen compositions mentioned above, from the total number submitted.

Our object in producing these new pieces is to stimulate the love of good music and to endeavor, as far as possible, to bring to the front the best productions available by our present-day composers, exclusively for Christian Herald readers. We feel assured that they will take great pleasure in the enterprise, and that the singing and playing of these compositions will bring joy into many home circles and church choirs. The first of the series will appear in next week's issue.

These hymns are copyrighted by the Christian Herald for the purposes of this publication.

THE General Education Board has issued the first instalment of its report for the last fiscal year. It shows that up to June 30, 1915, the Board had appropriated directly $16,862,147.71. Of this amount $10,848,084.07 was paid out, leaving a balance of something over $6,000,000 awaiting requisition. The total value of the Board's resources supplied by Mr. Rockefeller is $33,958,848.40, of which $30,000,000 is general endowment and $3,000,000 reserve. The appropriations for the year have been divided among universities and colleges, medical schools, schools for whites and for negroes, salaries for professors of secondary education, farmers' cooperative demonstration work, canning and poultry clubs, rural organization work, homemakers' clubs, and rural education.

Milk for Dying Babies

HERE is a crusade that every American can engage in heartily: To send milk to German, Austrian and Polish babies who will die if they do not get it.

Congressman Henry I. Emerson of Cincinnati, Ohio, has introduced the following resolution in the House of Representatives: That the Secretary of the United States call upon the representatives of the Allied Powers and urge them to permit the free, uninterrupted importation of condensed milk, from neutral countries, to Germany and Austria and their allies, solely for the relief of the babies and infants of said countries.

Recently the Christian Herald urged all its readers to write their respective congressmen, urging their support of this resolution. There is still time to be heard, but action must not be delayed. One mother writes from Upper Silesia: "For heaven's sake have pity on us and send us milk. My little boy is eight months old; he is but a skeleton; and I have no food for him. How can he survive? The two other children are trying to comfort me, saying, 'Mother, dear, we'll bear it if only God will keep you and the little brother and our dear father.'"

Dr. C. W. Larson, professor of dairy husbandry at the Pennsylvania State College and secretary of the official Dairy Instructors' Association, made a special and thorough study of dairy conditions in Europe a short time before the war, and has prepared a most careful statement arguing unanswerably that the milk shortage in Germany must be appalling. His statements are as follows:

1. Germany and Austria-Hungary are not doiry countries in times of peace; they do not produce enough of the dairy products for their own needs.

2. The amount of milk consumed by the adult in Germany is a very small amount. The average annual consumption is only obout seventy quarts per year.

3. Only small quantities of the manufactured dairy products are consumed, and a large percentage of these is imported. There is, therefore, not much milk from this source that can now be utilized for the babies.

4. Because of the location of the dairies where the milk for manufactured products, is produced this milk can not be transported to the consumer in time to make it fit for baby food.

5. Denmark, which has in the past supplied considerable of the dairy products to Germany, has had her output greatly decreased by being unable to secure concentroted feeds that she has imported in the past.

6. Germany and Austria-Hungary depended largely upon imported feeds for their cows; at least one-holf of the production of the cows was obtained from such feeds as cottonseed meal, oil cake and other protein products that before the war were imported by millions of tons from the United States, Russia and Egypt, in about equal quantities from the three countries.

THE Citizens' Committee, in issuing its appeal, states that "there are at least 5,000,000 babies in Germany and Austria-Hungary facing one of the greatest milk shortages in history. Germany has excellently well-kept dairies but the complete cessation of the American cottonseed meal exports and the necessity of reserving for human consumption large q ntities of grain, formerly fed to the cattle, has re lted in a milk shortage, which in certain localities thr tens the lives of the babies and nursing mothers, a endangers the health of all the children and inv ds."

In an address delivered at New York on Fel ary 27, part of which has already been quoted in the ristian Herald, Judge B. Lindsey said:

"More than 1,000,000 persons who never ouldered a rifle or heard the sound of cannon hav lied in Germany as a result of this war. I am to that more than one-half of those were babies. In any towns and cities of 30,000 or 40,000 in Poland here is not a baby alive under three years, and in any places not a child under ten years, so terrible ha een the demand for milk. Everybody ought to for the baby. We plead for equal opportunities f the babies of all the nations. Never shall I forg the sight of the hundreds of women gathered in a om, who, having suckled their own babies, were n sing the babies of others in the hope of saving thos hildren from starvation until another day could ring new supplies of milk from the dairies."

Arrangements are already made to have o ials of the American Red Cross superintend the di ibution of milk, guaranteeing that the supplies sh go only to babies. There is good ground for hopin that if a strong representation is made by this gover ent to the Allies they will let the shipments o milk through to the babies, who must otherwise die.

If you have not written your congressman out the Emerson Bill, do so at once.

The Columbia Gorge

Windowed tunnel at Mitchell's Point; a glimpse through one of the five apertures

THE gorge of the Columbia River near Portland, Oregon, has at last been made passable for automobiles, the direct result of the building of the Columbia River Highway, a hard-surfaced roadway from Portland to the Multnomah County line.

The construction of a highway through the gorge of the Columbia has been a dream of years, realized in the fall of 1915, when more than $2,000,000 was invested in forty miles of highway, or an average of more than $50,000 per mile.

The highway is one of the best illustrations of modern road-building in the world. In ten miles of travel more than twelve waterfalls throw their spray over the roadbed. At Multnomah Falls, second highest in the United States, the dedication of the highway will take place June 7, the opening day of Portland's Tenth Annual Rose Festival.

With a width of twenty-four feet, bridges, viaducts and culverts of concrete and all danger points protected by stone and concrete walls, the Columbia River Highway makes e of the finest and safest of auto bile roads. Many engineering pr ems were mastered, such as a descen rom Crown Point to Latourelle Falls, drop of over 500 feet in less than two iles. This was accomplished by a t of switchback, forming a figure eig yet keeping within a maximum gr e of five per cent. At Oneonta G e, a solid rock precipice, barred the wa and a tunnel 100 feet in length was red. At Mitchell's Point on the high y, a tunnel has been chiseled from solid rock and has five windows from hich can be seen a vista of the mi wide river at this point.

Recently the United States g ernment set aside 14,000 acres fr the Oregon National Forest for rec tion purposes. This land borders th ighway and is a veritable fairylan with its winding paths, waterfalls, hing grounds and gorgeous scenery. For miles the highway hangs to the ecipitous cliffs of the gorge, open up one of the grandest views of th kind in the world.

At Crown Point, 700 feet above the river, a memorial to the pioneers of Oregon is being erected. From this spot a view of thirty-five miles in either direction is obta d

Our Friends the Birds

By BEECHER S. BOWDISH

Secretary of the New Jersey Audubon Society

I 1886 the first Audubon ociety was launched, without iembership fees. By August, 887, the membership of this rga zation had grown to 48,400, ut e decline came in 1888, and ithı t adequate financial resources his st Audubon Movement gradall ell away. Conditions became boı as bad as before, and bird millinery took on ene d popularity.

T organization of the Massachusetts Audubon oci y in 1886 practically commenced the second or res t Audubon movement. A Pennsylvania Auduon ociety soon followed, and in a few years thirtyve ites had such societies, and a federation of these ociees into the National Association of Audubon oci es was accomplished, under the leadership of Ir. Villiam Dutcher. Physical disability in 1910 om lled Mr. Dutcher's retirement from the active ire on of the Association's activities, which was ienassumed by the secretary, Mr. T. Gilbert ea n; but, rejoicing that its guiding spirit had er pared to activity at the helm to see the great ıce s of his labors and his faith, the association has ta d Mr. Dutcher in the presidency.

T State Audubon Societies have performed in ta in their own spheres, those duties more particurly elonging to their own functions. Made up of a en ership resident within the state, a state society of ı able to appeal to local sentiment with greater re han could a national organization. Thus some ıp ant laws result solely from the activities of at ocieties, as in the case of the New Jersey plumge ıw, the need for which called the New Jersey ud on Society into existence.

A w enacted in New Jersey in 1885, forbidding the lli of nighthawks, whippoorwills, gulls, terns, ng nd insectivorous birds, has been described as or ably the first comprehensive bird law passed, in at protected all the birds that could not strictly e sidered game birds."

A hat time many markets of the country offered bi , catbirds, brown thrashers, warblers, waxwings, ov and owls as food species. Gulls, terns, herons, eb and many song birds were slaughtered in uı ess numbers, their plumage being required by e llinery trade.

T present greatly accelerated movement toward me general knowledge of the habits of birds, and ns uent protection and encouragement, finds still or letailed expression in the organization of many a ird clubs, which greatly aid in the unending ur e against the killing of birds through erroneous p sions as to their food habits on the part of the ri turist; the efforts of gunners to have song and se vorous birds added to the game list; the introict n of measures to provide bounties for the killing v able mouse-eating hawks and other predatory d the lack of legal supervision of roaming cats, o kill may total fifty birds per year to the cat.

THE birds that have weathered the stress of bitter winter storms, thanks, in large part, to the humane and wise succor that the Audubon Movement has taught, are now with us. In the dooryard the chickadee, with his merry "dee-dee," snatches a bite from the suet that has been fastened on the tree trunk, then yields his place to the downy woodpecker, and institutes a search of bark crevices for the dormant insect and its eggs. The junco demurely eats a few of the canary seeds in the repast provided, then scurries away to attack the weed stalks protruding through the snow in the garden. Tree sparrows and white-throated sparrows are busy in the hedgerow, consuming vast quantities of weed seed, awaiting the next storm before having recourse to our free lunch counter. Crows fly over the fields, to pick up here a stray kernel of corn, there to pounce on an unwary field mouse, or perhance to carry away a bit of refuse. The song-sparrow, perched in the vines on the porch, in a burst of melody voices his unfailing confidence in spring's return.

And soon spring will be here, and every stage of her triumphal entry will be greeted by new hosts of returning birds. Thrushes will enchant us with their marvelous melody. Our eyes will catch the brilliant glint of the oriole, the tanager and the rose-breasted grosbeak, as they dart through the trees in search of insect food. On the lawn the robin army will first wax large and then diminish, as northern travelers depart and local summer members commence the mud masonwork of their little homes. We shall hear the sweet lisp of the bluebird's note, and if we have provided houses for their accommodation we may enjoy the society of a bluebird family as tenants, or it may be we shall be entertained and benefited by a wren lodger, whose outbursts of bubbling song cheer our summer hours, while constant excursions rid our foliage of numberless insects.

As early as February returning blackbirds may be seen. In late February or early March migrant robins and bluebirds mingle with the stragglers that have wintered in the cedar swamps. Woodcock, kingfisher, mourning dove, fox and swamp sparrows may all have appeared before the end of March. In the first week or two of April, vesper, savanna and chipping sparrows, tree swallow and hermit thrush may greet us. Then come the sapsucker, barn swallow, kinglet and the earliest warblers, followed by the whippoorwill, chimney swift, least flycatcher, towhee, thrasher, wren, earlier vireos and more swallows and warblers, the catbird and wood thrush. May brings us the cuckoo, nighthawk, hummingbird, kingbird, oriole, bobolink, rosebreasted grosbeak, scarlet tanager, indigo bunting and the great warbler and vireo armies. Before the last of the month, the most tardy migrants have usually arrived, and many early birds have not only "caught the worm," but have started housekeeping as well.

Our summer survey of bird life not only shows us birds expressing Nature's design in keeping down insects, rodents and weeds, but a course in bird individualities or bird architecture would, in themselves, be no mean addition to our store of knowledge. On the ground we find the neatly lined, cup-shaped hollows in which families of young song, vesper and grasshopper sparrows are reared, or the domed abodes of the ovenbird or bobwhite. Scant architecture suffices as a receptacle for the eggs of the woodcock, nighthawk or whippoorwill, and no home ties will bind the young when hatched. The orioles and vireos swing their hanging cradles from the forked twig, anywhere from a few feet above the ground to the higher branches of the lofty trees. The frailest platform of twigs, with scanty or no lining, is "home, sweet home" to the young cuckoos and mourning doves. The barn and eave swallows are masons, most of whose interesting structures are found about the eaves and rafters of buildings, instead of in the roofs of caves, like those of their ancestors. So long have the most of the chimney swift tribe forsaken hollow trees for the chimney flue, against the inner surface of which the twig basket of a nest is glued, the whole being held together and fastened to the bricks with a glue formed by the saliva of the birds, that from this abode they derive the name. The bank swallow and kingfisher, however, are true "cave-dwellers," with their homes at the extremity of burrows dug by the birds in earth banks. A warm lining of dry grass and feathers is provided by the swallow, but a scant accumulation of fish bones and scales suffices as a resting place for the kingfisher's pearly treasures. The woodpeckers are borers, too, but a dead branch or trunk of a tree is the chosen home site, and a few bits of chips is the only carpet they require. Next year some of these habitations will be refurnished by tree swallows, nuthatches or titmice, with a soft warm lining of feathers, fur or down. The chickadee, however, will prefer to do his own carpenter work, selecting the softest dead wood for the operations of his weak little bill. The phœbe, like the barn swallow, is a mason, but his adobe home must be beautifully shingled with green moss. The crested flycatcher must be "different" from the rest of his family, so a knothole or deserted woodpecker burrow conceals his household affairs from prying gaze. The wood pewee would not resort to a knothole, but with lichens from the bark of the trees he can make his tiny cup of a nest resemble a knot on a branch. With gray plant

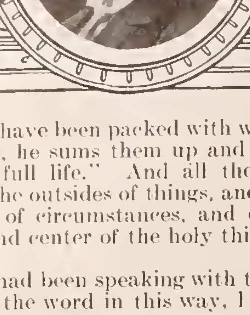
THE SPIRITUAL SIDE OF THINGS



A SERMON

By

*REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

TEXT -Matt 12 . 50. "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother."

THIS saying of our Lord's sometimes strikes the reader with a certain suggestion of harshness and disrespect; there is an apparent want of tenderness in the words, as though the speaker were half impatient in his speech. But we may always assume that the apparent harshness of the Master is due to the dull apprehension of his readers. In the first place, everybody knows how the meaning of a word can be changed by altering the tone in which it is spoken. By changing the tone we can turn a reproof into an appeal, an imperative into a tender exhortation. A gesture can add the richest suggestion to a speech. Looks and smiles have a language of their own which mingles with the speaker's words. And so it is possible to misquote a man even when we quote him correctly.

The saying may be verbally accurate, and yet it may convey an impression the very opposite to that intended by the speaker himself. And so it is with the words I have just quoted, and which have frequently stirred people into painful wonder. We must imagine the look of the Master as he turned his eyes toward his mother. We must imagine his tones, and we must try to realize the diffused and sunny sympathy with which he embraced both the members of his family and those of the disciple band.

But what can have been his purpose in speaking these words? It is needful that we should realize the condition of the people among whom our Master lived. They were becoming, or had become, the victims of a very perilous habit. Their life was running to the outsides of things. Their proneness to give exclusive attention to the "outside of the cup" was symbolic of a general tendency in their life. They were becoming more and more superficial, and were living on the mere surfaces of things. They were in danger of taking a shallow view of everything. Their ideal of purity was limited by the conception of "washed hands." Their ideal of a holy Sabbath found expression in petty restrictions and in inhuman abstentions from service.

And so the envelope was becoming more than the message it contained. The letter of the evangel was treasured more than the spirit. This was true of even the disciples themselves. When our Master spake to them, they instinctively leaped to some outside interpretation of the words. If he spoke of bread, they thought of loaves and fishes. They did not readily respond to the spiritual significance of the Master's words and works.

OUR Lord had to meet this tendency on every side, and he sought to break the habit and to lead the thoughts of his hearers to the insides of things, to the secret place of the Eternal. He was constantly endeavoring to deepen the shallow lives of his hearers. And this is the key to a multitude of things he said and did. If we remember that his purpose was to get away from the husk to the kernel of life, and to get people to live in the insides of things, we shall understand many sayings that are now obscure. And so it is with the saying to which I want to lead our present meditation. Those who were standing about him had just used the words "mother" and "brother" and "sister," and the Master at once apprehended the shallow significance which they attached to the words.

So here, again, he carried out his deepening ministry and led them into more profound relations. He would lead them from the conception of fleshly fellowships to spiritual relations. He would show them that there were deeper kinships than the honored kinships of flesh and blood. Not that he slighted these, or in any way disparaged them; for he always held them in tender and chivalrous regard; but he put them in their right place and gave preeminence to communion of spirits, to family likeness in the realm of the soul. So that what we get out of this habit of Jesus is just this—his purpose to lead us to the spiritual sides of things. He wants us so to cultivate the spiritual inwardness of all things that the spiritual sides shall at length become magnetic, and immediately arrest the interest of mind and soul. Let us consider how the principle will act in the actual fields of life.

There is the spiritual side of life itself. The current usage of the great word is frequently thin and superficial. A man speaks of "enjoying a bit of life," or he boasts of having seen "a good bit of life," or, when his days have been packed with work or crowded with pleasures, he sums them up and claims to have had "a very full life." And all these phrases are significant of the outsides of things, and keep us in the circumference of circumstances, and do not take us to the heart and center of the holy thing.

NOW, if we had been speaking with the Master, and had used the word in this way, I think he would have immediately caught our conversation and turned us away to the depths. If we had been speaking about Dives, and had hinted that he had enjoyed a "full life," the Master might have answered: "And what is life? A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things he possesseth." Real life is not found in things, but in relations, and that not in carnal relations, but in communion with God. And he would tell us that no matter how vast were our accumulations of earthly treasure, nor how many carnal fellowships we enjoyed, we were dead. "This is life—to know Thee." We are to cultivate the spiritual aspects of common life.

Then consider the matter of worship. All my readers are familiar with the common tendency to dwell in the outsides of things when we presume to worship the eternal God. If we could listen the members of a congregation as they retire fr the sanctuary after a Sunday service, we shoul find that a large proportion of them were conc ning themselves with the letter to the ignoring the spirit. Some would speak of the rendering the anthem, and never mention the message o God. Others would speak about the oratory of the s non, and never hint at the sacred message from the rnal God. We so frequently regard our worshi as a matter of words or a matter of attitudes and rms.

Now, the Lord would fasten our eyes on the s itual aspects of worship. It is not that he despi the ministry of forms, or that he wishes us to nfine the form to something unfinished and ugly He desires "strength and beauty in his sanctuary but he teaches that a beautiful form may be a min er of death unless it is possessed by the vitalizing s it of life. And so he would lead us to dwell on the pper side of worship—the spiritual side, the higher here where the soul holds communion with the E rnal. He would have us listen to the anthem fr the inside, catching a finer music than ever fall rom human lips. He would have us listen to the mon from the inside, and catch the Voice whose goo news can never be enshrined in human speech. He ould have us pray from the inside, spirit with spi not embarrassed by the form, not allowing ourse s to be hindered by any posture, but seeking the ecret place where we meet him face to face. And so are to emphasize not the beauty of music, but the auty of holiness; not the amount of the gift, but th pirit of the giver. "My son, give me thine heart."

And then there is the spiritual side of work. There is nothing more common than the habit of li g in the outsides of daily labor. We come to rega our ordinary time exclusively as a means of emplo ent, and as a machinery by which we earn our daily read. And just because we so live in the outsides o ork, it is often extremely wearying and oppressi If we lived on the spiritual side of our calling, we ould find a sunnier realm and clearer, finer air. F how does the Lord teach us to regard it? We are to gard it as a means of grace, a ministry by which we not only to earn our daily bread, but through wh h we are to grasp the Bread of Life. It is to be helpmeet, not only for enriching the purse, but enriching character.

LOOK, again, at the spiritual side of Nature. lany of us rarely get beyond the realm of the nses; and that realm is not one to be despised. Won fully gracious is the ministry of song and color a perfume, but we limit the purpose of the Almight if we only seek our satisfaction in physical delights. New worlds come into view when we seek the spiritu side of our natural surroundings. It must have en a mighty experience to walk down a country la with John Ruskin; but what must have been the exp ence to move among the wonders and beauties of c tion in the company of Jesus Christ! What reve tion must have come to those who walked with him t ough the cornfield or among the lilies or on the m tain slope, or stood with him on the shore by a b king wave! Everything was like an envelope, d he opened it to find the message. And even tho h we are far from being experts in the gracious art, e al have some power in deciphering the hidden gnificance of God's world. And it is an art that gr s by exercise. Let us confront the things that are bou us in eager questioning. Let us ask them to evea to us their spiritual secrets. The flower, th bird the evening cloud, the morning dew! "What r ssag do these bright summers tell?" Let us see the inward treasure, and so enrich our souls.

And lastly there is the spiritual side of eath. There are many people who are depressed th great outsides of death, by the fleshly aspect of it or the dark trappings, or the melancholy grav ards. It is the duty and the privilege of Christians ge above these gloomy tokens, and to rise into th light and liberty of the resurrection. It is our inhe an in Christ Jesus to live and move on the s itual side of death, and to dwell in a deathless com union with Christ. "He shall never die!" "He shal never taste death!" If we get on that side, and liv here we shall attain unto release and promotio an enlargement and triumph. And so there is a s itual side to everything. Let us practice it step b step moment by moment, until some day it will th spiritual that will instinctively become our pos ssion and our delight.

The Dream of the Kings

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, sleeping, saw a vision
That vanished with the night;
Troubled, he sought the seers and the magicians
To call it back to light.
But none could tell it till Jehovah's prophet
Read him the dream aright —
The symbols of the empires of the ages,
Their splendor and their might

So have they come -the kingdoms of the Image—
So have they passed away;
Babylon, Persia, Greece of shining beauty,
Proud Rome's imperial sway,
Silver and gold have gone, and brass and iron,—
Each had its little day,
Leaving a mass of mingled strength and weakness,
The iron and the clay.

ONCE more the kings of earth are dreaming—dreaming
Of that world-wide domain,
Of olden glories and of ancient greatness
Their sleeping souls are fain,
Striving with sword and spear, with force and fury,
That mastery to gain
Every man's hand they set against his fellow;
But all their dreams are vain.

Vain, O ye kings! Though ye have called your captains,
Your mighty men of war,
Though ye have summoned chariots and horsemen,
A hundred thousand score;
Time's horologe will neither halt nor hasten
Nor yet the past restore;
Forfeit your crowns and all your thrones are falling;
Your dynasties are o'er.

LATE, all too late; the hour of doom draws nearer;
Ye have not dreamed aright
Have ye forgotten how the Image crumbled?
That yet the Stone must smite?
This is no dimness of the dawn, that brightens
To noonday's flooding light;
It is the twilight, that can only darken
To black and hopeless night.

Iron of kings, their straining fingers grasping
A broken sceptre still;
Clay of the people, plastic, freshly molded
By each new potter's skill;
Weakness and strength, united, yet divided,
They work Jehovah's will,
Throughout the ages, blind and all unknowing,
His purpose they fulfil.

Daily Meditation

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY

A Better Resurrection

SUNDAY, April 9. Heb. 11:35. "Not accepting their deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection." They preferred a glorious death to an inglorious life. They chose death a mighty cause to life with a mean compromise. He had no desire for life if life was to be robbed it crown; they would rather die crowned! Where as the honor of living, if honor had been thrown And so they chose death with honor's flag in the holy confidence that they would emerge better resurrection with the flag flying still! He would not have life at any price; they would have it when it was leagued with the supreme of unstained loyalty to the Lord.

The disciple of Christ is always beset by the temptation to accept mean deliverances. He is offered some easy deliverance from hardship, some release from deprivation, some escape from pain. We are shown how we can avoid contact with gruesome realities. We are allured to avenues where we escape the sights of the back streets. We are offered [illegible] against the horrors and terrors of our day. There is a way out! We have only to numb ourselves, and we shall know nothing about them. There are cocaines, and opiates, and drugs; and if we take these regularly we can be delivered from much of the [illegible] side of things; indeed, we shall scarcely know they exist! And so a cunning soul, intent upon noble escape, can manage to wriggle through with seeming comfort and success. He can "pass the other side," or he can hide the slaughter-house with a pretty creeper. He can shut out the [illegible] sewer with eau de Cologne. He can "accept his deliverance."

But the real disciple of Jesus will have none of it. He rejects these easy escapes. He refuses the benumbing ministries of social opiates and drugs. To him life is only welcome, only desirable, when his spiritual and moral senses are all awake. The only life, all that is worth calling life, is bound up in the bundle of life with Jesus Christ his Lord. "This is life to know Thee!" "For to me to live is Christ!" Rupture of that union is death, even though I am clothed in purple and fine linen, and dance in the whirl of social delights every day and night in the [illegible] year. It is life with dishonor, and that is death. To remain in steadfast union with Christ, though the life, may mean loss, and hardships, and [illegible], and apparent defeat. What then? They did not accept their deliverance that they might obtain a "better resurrection." We wear God's garland even on this side of the grave, and we shall wear an immortal glory when we meet our Saviour face to face. J. H. J.

Waiting on God

MONDAY, April 10. Isa. 64:1-12. "Which worketh for him that waiteth for him." Our trouble is that we are so impatient, we will not wait. Like Saul, we force ourselves—as we put it—and offer the sacrifice, because Samuel tarries, and in that act we forfeit the kingdom. Our impatience fills us with the fever of unrest; and if the Master tarry, we remind him more than once that if he had not delayed, we should have been saved from the bitterness of the grave. But all this is as wrong as it is natural. A ninth beatitude might be rendered thus: "Blessed is the man that waiteth upon God; he will find that while he waits, God is working on his behalf." Suppose that a miner were suddenly overwhelmed by a fall of coal blocking the narrow passage to liberty. He might attempt with pickax and shovel to work a way through the thick-ribbed walls of his cell. Yet what could one frail pair of arms do, however eager the desire? Presently the man detects the distant muffled sound which assures him of the efforts that are being made for his rescue. In absolute exhaustion he casts down his implements and waits, knowing that while he waits, strong and willing hands are bringing deliverance. This is a true glimpse into the ways of God. He does not leave us comfortless, he comes to us. When we count ourselves forsaken, the Lord has already descended to the beach from the mountain oratory, and is stepping off the shore to the waters that are chafing around his feet. While you wait, not in listless indolence, but in thought and prayer and faith, God is working for you. Every moment he is coming nearer. Notice the next verse: "Thou meetest him that rejoiceth and worketh righteousness." Sometimes he meets us, as in Ex. 4:27 and 28. When Paul quotes this verse in 1 Cor. 2:9, he changes those that wait into those who love. Love can wait! F. B. M.

Good Habits in Place of Bad Ones

TUESDAY, April 11. Matt. 12:45. "And the last state of that man becometh worse than the first." When in our hours of meditation and self-examination we become conscious of wrong habits or selfish tendencies, it is a natural thing for an honest person to determine to cast out that evil spirit; this resolve is not always successful, since, like the man in the Gospel, we expel the evil habit without welcoming a good habit to take its place. No life can long endure emptiness. Normal human lives demand action, and habits are the conveyers of our actions. If I drive out envy or malice, and do not at once inaugurate the habits of love and sympathy, the old occupants are certain to return to my vacant heart.

Christ was always trying to get people to resolve to something, not simply from something. Paul besought to "put on the Lord Jesus Christ," as well as to put off the "old man."

The cultivation of love and forbearance for others is one of the safest habits to form; and this love should be cultivated without inquiring whether others deserve that love or not. It is always difficult for any human being to know surely whether another deserves our love, for we never know the heart, and we cannot see behind the scenes. Only God can truly judge; it is for us to love and to help, and let God do the judging and the criticizing. This attitude of caring and trying to aid by sympathy can be formed, like any other habit, and, once formed, it takes the place of indifference and intolerance, opening up our whole lives to faith and light. C. S. C.

"The Angel of the Lord"

WEDNESDAY, April 12. Ex. 3:1-10. "The Angel of the Lord." Who was this august Being, whose presence was symbolized by the unfueled flame which burnt in that bush? We must put off our shoes if we would understand. Put off pride, and evil thoughts, and mere curiosity, and wait until the speaker reveals himself. Evidently he is divine, for he calls himself I AM—the ever-living and unchanging One. He demands and accepts divine honors. He binds himself by convenant-promises, which only divine power can achieve.

In his defense before the Sanhedrin, Stephen declares that the angel who appeared to Moses in the bush was the same angel which spake to him on Mount Sinai, some forty years afterward. David, in his great psalm, when the ark is brought into the tent prepared for it, says that the angel of Sinai was the same that ascended on high and received gifts for men. Paul, in his letter to the Ephesians, announced that he who ascended was Christ. See Acts 7:30-34; Ps. 78:17; Eph. 4:7-9.

The term "angel" signifies, not a race of holy existences, but their office. The word means envoy, messenger, one who is sent. Undoubtedly any heavenly being sent on an errand of helpfulness is a messenger or angel; but One above all others deserves that name, even he who came out from the bosom of the Father to reveal his nature, and conduct us through all our wilderness wanderings to his presence. Apply this wondrous name to Jesus Christ. His is underived and independent existence. His is the eternal Now. His is the unchangeableness that has neither yesterday nor tomorrow, but only today. His is the great reality beneath all the chances and changes of this mortal life. He said himself, "Before Abraham, I AM." F. B. M.

God's Cure for Indolence

THURSDAY, April 13. Luke 5:4. "Put out into the deep!" We are often inclined to lose much valuable time and important opportunities, waiting for the right combination of circumstances before starting to work. Some people say that they cannot write letters that should be written because they are not in the mood; others excuse themselves from duty because the circumstances do not seem appropriate. The Jewish fishermen were sitting around the boat in which Jesus sat preaching; it was apparently not an appropriate time to fish, and the fact that they had not been successful the night before offered a good excuse. The Master abruptly left off preaching, and turning to Simon, said, "Put out into the deep and let down your nets for a draught!"

The cure for indolence is beginning to work. A distinguished preacher once remarked that in every case when in the Bible an angel appeared to a man, that man was at work. A great teacher of music confessed that the secret of his success lay in learning at an early age not to be ruled by his feelings, since usually his feelings changed when he began to do the thing that he ought to be doing at that particular time. A famous author gave as his only advice to a young man who wished to become an author: "Sit down and begin to write!" Dr. Hilty, a Swiss teacher of note, says: "If one permits himself habitually to stop and ask that indolent part of him which the apostle calls 'the old man' what he would like to do, or would prefer not to do, 'the old man' is most unlikely to vote for serious work, but betakes himself to excellent religious or moral advice."

Today, this very hour, let me begin the task that has been hanging over me! I shall find it easier when I am fairly at it. I am a Christian soldier under discipline. My orders are: "Put out into the deep!" C. S. C.

The World's Sin-Bearer

FRIDAY, April 14. Ex. 12:1-11. "It is the Lord's Passover." That the paschal lamb was typical of the salvation wrought on Calvary is clear from Paul's explicit statement: Christ our passover is sacrificed for us, therefore let us keep the feast. The Passover feast commemorated a great deliverance, but we have been delivered from a slavery, a captivity, a dread far more intolerable. The destruction from which Israel was delivered was otherwise inevitable; and the redemption wrought by Jesus our Lord is the only hope of mankind. Consider the personal qualities of the two victims. Was the paschal lamb perfect, without blemish, a male of the first year? So our Lord died in the flower of his strength, without blemish or spot. Was the blood of the lamb sprinkled, that it might avail? We can draw near with boldness into the holiest, when our hearts are sprinkled from an evil conscience. The paschal lamb was slain and offered for the entire congregation; the Lamb of God taketh away the sin of the whole world. "He," says the apostle, "is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." The Hebrews killed the lamb between the two evenings, and this, three in the afternoon, was the point of time when our Lord expired on the cross. "About the ninth hour he cried with a loud voice, and gave up the ghost." Not a bone of the paschal lamb might be broken; so when our Lord was crucified, the soldiers forbore to break his legs, but they pierced his side, and revealed a broken heart. The paschal lamb was prepared as food, and by fire. So we must feed on Christ, by daily meditation, prayer, and faith. But let us never forget that his soul was exceeding sorrowful unto death, and that the fire of judgment—our judgment—burnt around his soul. Behold the Lamb of God! F. B. M.

One Look from the Face of Jesus

SATURDAY, April 15. Luke 22:61. "And the Lord turned and looked upon Peter." Peter did not turn first and look upon Jesus, but when he caught the gaze of his Master and saw the loving, longing look of mercy, compassion and pity, he was so overwhelmed that the tears of penitence flowed like a flood. Peter did not desire to see his Master, whom he had denied and forsaken; he just cast one more glance at the passing throng leading Jesus across the open court, when suddenly the glory of Jesus' face shone upon him. It must have been a look of rebuke as well as of love. Perhaps it was the wrath and love of the Lamb of God mingled in piteous pleading.

Peter first came to himself; then he came to Jesus, sobbing alone in that sacred hour of repentance. One look from Christ, like a lightning flash, can reveal the soul to itself by the horrors of remorse, shame and a torturing conscience. Jesus is terrible in his gentleness in order to save. He need not speak a word—only look!

The faces of those whose voices are silent are looking at us still. It is a composite countenance of loved ones gone, and Jesus' face, all gazing at you to win you home. E. W. C.

Women Students at Columbia

THE Columbia University trustees the other day voted to admit women as students in the College of Physicians and Surgeons as soon as the present medical school buildings can be adapted for the proper accommodation of women. Since 1889 efforts have been made by women to induce the university to open the medical school to them. The entering wedge came with the decision five years ago of Professor James C. Egbert, director of the summer session, to offer certain medical courses during the summer to which women might be admitted. The number of these at first was very limited, but each summer the number of courses has rapidly increased, and many women seized the opportunity. The trustees also voted that, contingent upon funds being provided and suitable hospital arrangements made, the curriculum be extended from four to five years, that a higher standard of entrance examinations should be required, and that the last year should be spent in practical service at some accredited hospital. The opening of the doors of the Columbia College of Physicians and Surgeons will give women the latest and best methods of medical instruction, and will have its influence on other institutions which are barred against them. There are numbers of efficient women physicians, and many others are being prepared for the call of duty to this great field of merciful and benevolent service. A goodly number take their degrees that they may go to foreign missionary fields which are ripe for their work, imitating Christ, who was a physician to the body as well as the soul, illustrating his perfect manhood and Messiahship also in his blessed ministry of physical healing, thus referred to: "And great multitudes followed him, and he healed them all." (Matt. 12: 15.)

Personal Testimony

IN a sermon preached recently by Rev. Dr. David Gregg on "Being Converted to Convert Some One Else," there is this paragraph on the value of personal testimony in saving others: "The usual methods of propagating a great cause were entirely discarded by Christ. The sword he declined; money he had none; literature he never used; the church disowned him; the state crucified him. Planting his ideas in the hearts of a few poor men, he started them out unheralded to revolutionize the world. They did it by making friends. They went about doing good. They told the story of what Christ was to them and what he did for them, how he found them and changed them, and they proved the truth of their own story by living changed and Christlike lives. The result was, men believed them, entered into sympathy with them and with their Christ, and then reached their experiences and relived their lives. Thus the kingdom of God came down the ages by contagion, and through the power of personal testimony." One of the two texts for the sermon was: "I will declare what he hath done for my soul." (Ps. 66: 16.)

Fighting Mosquitoes

THE Board of Estimate of New York City the other day concurred in the resolution of the Board of Aldermen appropriating $150,000 for the use of the Commissioner of Health in exterminating mosquitoes from the salt meadows in the Jamaica Bay district. The action was opposed by Mr. A. C. Weeks, who said salt marsh mosquitoes are not disease-breeding, and that if every dollar in the state were used for the purpose, it would be impossible to exterminate these pests. Science is making relentless war on the mosquito, on the grown one in the home, and on the germs in the breeding-places. Colonel Gorgas had phenomenal success in killing the mosquitoes of the Canal Zone by filling in ponds, draining swamps and destroying the germs. Pestiferous insects in Bible times are thus referred to figuratively: "The Lord shall hiss for the fly that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt, and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria. And they shall come, and shall rest in the desolate valleys, and in the holes of the rocks, and upon all thorns, and upon all bushes." (Isa. 7: 18, 19.)

Ontario's Petition for Prohibition

THE last week in February a volunteer army of 35,000 men circulated petitions for provincial prohibition in Ontario. At the close of one week 825,652 signatures were secured, 348,166 of which were names of male voters, while 477,396 were women and young men who are minors, but all residents of the province. One of the most significant temperance demonstrations ever held on this continent was that in Queen's Park, Toronto, when these petitions of over three-quarters of a million names were presented to the premier, W. H. Hearst. The names represented 71 per cent. of the voters at the last provincial election. Mr. Hearst made an unequivocal announcement that a prohibitory law would be enacted and submitted to the people for ratification at an early date. The bill proposed is likely to be passed by non-partisan votes, and become a law, making Ontario dry at one stroke. This mammoth demonstration of petitioners for prohibition was under the auspices of the Committee of One Hundred, under the efficient chairmanship of Mr. G. A. Warburton, which started the 35,000 men out and secured the names. The Ontario branch of the Dominion Temperance Alliance, an interdenominationol non-partisan organization under the leodership of F. S. Spence, Benjamin Spence and others, had done much to prepare the way for the great popular demonstration, in driving the drinking places by local option out of 573 municipalities, leaving only 274 under license. Other provinces have made great progress in temperance legislation. Prince Edward Island is entirely dry, Nova Scotia is under prohibition except the city of Halifax, New Brunswick has prohibition in ten out of fifteen counties, and in all except one city. Quebec has 906 dry municipalities and only 237 wet. Manitoba on March 14 voted on prohibition. Every bar in Saskatchewan was closed June 30, 1915, and the local traffic in that province is restricted to twenty shops under government control. The prohibitory law of Alberta goes into effect July, 1916. In British Columbia the government had pledged to submit a prohibitory law to the people this year. The Canadian Parliament is contemplating restrictive temperance legislation. In a few years Canada is likely to go dry. The nation-wide, the race-wide war on the liquor traffic which is being waged by Christ's followers is one of the signs of the establishment of his kingdom in accordance with this prophecy: "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." (Isa. 11: 9.)

BECAUSE pink La France roses were the favorite flowers of her departed daughter, Mrs. Elizabeth Reed of Oakland, Calif., in her will, requested that the Reed cemetery plot be always covered with these roses, and left $500 for that purpose. Flowers are the most exquisite materialization of God's ideas which he employs as an embroidery for nature's garment, and as a token of his love for man. On nodding plume and waving branch he has hung the blossoms of snowy whiteness or of crimson hues as perpetual expressions of his love for us. And we take them and use them as symbols of our love for each other. What a beautiful thought that pink roses be used perpetually as an expression of a mother's love for her daughter! The archway of the tomb is festooned with cypress, but all through it are woven the rose of Sharon and the lily of the valley, and it is not the odor of the charnel house, but the fragrance of upper flower gardens that is wafted to the Christian. Put roses in the still hands of the dead, in belief in "our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light in the Gospel." (II Tim. 1: 10.)

Historic Relics Destroyed

THE famous old home of the late Frederick W. Seward, son of William H. Seward, Secretary of State in President Lincoln's Cabinet, was destroyed by fire at Montrose, N. Y., on March 13, with a loss of $75,000. Many valuable curios collected in the last fifty years, together with valuable paintings, a magnificently stocked library with many autograph copies, letters of notables in the history of the country, and important public documents, including some from hi illustrious father, were destroyed. ne of the executors of the Seward esta who had gone to the old homestead take an inventory of the personal feets barely escaped with his life. and his mother rushed out into tl deep snow as the flames had almost ught them. Fire may destroy furnit and paintings, and books, but not tl fame of men who painted the pictu and wrote the books; not the chara er or service of William H. Sewa , as exemplified in his patriotic devo on in the Civil War, his Alaska purcha , and other acts. There is this referenc o the fire-proof things of the Spirit: Every man's work shall be made n ifest, for the day shall declare it, be use it shall be revealed by fire; and e fire shall try every man's work wh sort it is." (I Cor. 3: 13.)

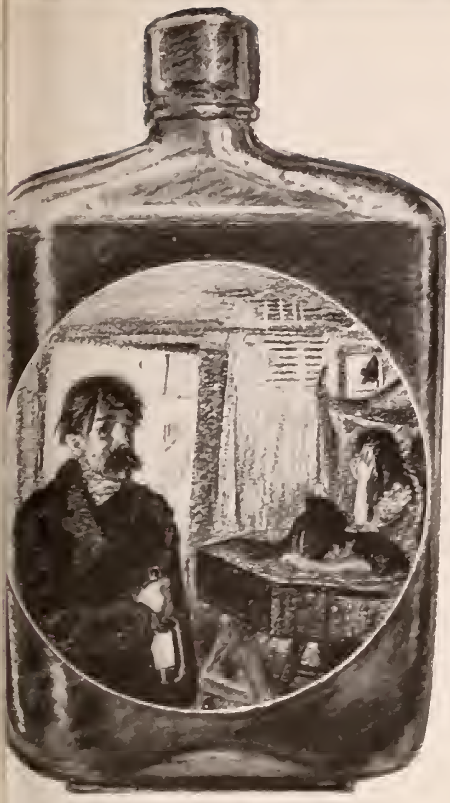
"THE BOTTLE"—VII.



THE STRICKEN SAPLING

Dear John:

I'm done with drink.

Bill Jr. is dead.

I didn't realize the poor kid was going.

Drink made me too proud to do ordinary work.

Drink prevented me from holding down good jobs.

Little Bill killed himself working.

Flory says she wishes she was dead too.

Sitting here, miserable and conscience-stricken, I have been trying to figure out where I first began to drink. Do you know, John, it was at the dances, at the houses of my father's friends. Years ago, just after I left High School.

I'm just going to take a few drops to dull the edge of my sorrow.

Tomorrow I'll come round to see you. Any kind of work you got, I'll be glad to do.

BILL.

Dear Bill:

We have waited and looked for you these last two months. Where have you been hiding?

We had a messenger trying to locate you for several days, after we received your letter telling of little Bill's death. We have hired a man to trace you. He will give you this note.

He has my orders to bring you to me. He will accept no excuse. Be a good fellow and come along.

It is late in the game, but if you will make an effort, we'll help all we can.

Our boy graduates next week at the High School. We would welcome you there.

With every earnest wish for your appearing soon,

Your old friends,

JANE and JOHN.

Scholars Reply to Attack on Christianity

WHEN the announcement was made in December last of the publication of a new book by Professor Ernst aeckel of Jena University, entitled Et nity—Thoughts about Life and ea , Religion and the Doctrine of vo ion," it was accompanied by a ea flourish of trumpets from those ho believed that the distinguished on had struck a vital blow at the hri ian religion. A long account of e w volume, including a number of tra s, appeared in the New York m of December 22. The book seems, ow ever, to have attracted but little te on, either in Europe or America; de , up to the present time it has t en reprinted here, and none of e ding theological writers who have questioned by the Christian Herald ve ver seen a copy of it.

A ong the passages from the book bl to the Times, the authenticity w ch has not been questioned, and ic it printed on the date already en oned, were the following:

A NG the tremendous impressions of s struggle, nothing is more overwhelm- hing enters so deeply into our souls. t sudden changes from life to death. ily ng lists of dead confront us. Strapping and faithful fathers are carried away th bloom of life, and from thousands of questions are asked about the value d aning of human life about eternity, d out the immortality of the soul.

W has reduced to absurdity the doctrines pr idence and predestination. In view of the death of such masses of people, and in view of the fact that daily thousands die in open battle, in the trenches, in air machines, submarines, hospitals and prison camps—all of them carried away by blind chance, and others owing their escape to the same blind chance—the illusion that the destinies of men are in the care of an Omnipotent Intelligence with carefully arranged plans is an idea which cannot be entertained for a moment.

This war proves the absurdity of the Christian principle of loving one's neighbors and the futility of pacifism and Christian ethics. Both have been declared bankrupt.

The horror which we see daily is but the mockery of "Love thy neighbor as thyself."

THE publication of a new book by Professor Haeckel has always been viewed as an event. His latest volume was regarded as an open challenge to Christianity. The extracts above quoted have been submitted to several Americans eminent in theology and scientific thought, and while they uniformly hesitate at expressing an opinion on a work which they have not examined, their letters are interesting as showing the slight importance they attach to any attack by so pronounced a writer against Christianity as Professor Haeckel has shown himself to be. Professor Henry Mitchell MacCracken of New York University writes:

"Dr. Ernst Haeckel has made much research in natural history. I am willing to defer to his opinions when he discusses such a theme as 'Life in the Great Marine Animals.' On the other hand, his opinions in philosophy and ethics, so far as I have met them, are neither new nor important. His notion that the present war disproves theism and the central theses of Christian ethics and theology, any more than former wars disproved them, has no argument whatever beneath it. The mystery cannot be explained that of sixteen hundred millions of human beings who were alive New Year's Day, 1900, one-fourth died before they had reached a sixth birthday and one-half before they had reached a sixteenth birthday. It is much less a mystery to one like myself, who believes that men are left to the freedom of their own wills to do either good or evil, to believe that in the years 1914-16, through the agency of war, an additional one per cent. of the human race may have perished who, but for the war, would have been alive today. In spite of these mysteries, and of the skepticism of many scientific scholars like Professor Haeckel, every normal human soul, from the child to the greatest philosopher, will still find each an argument for uttering sincerely that strain of the 'Te Deum' which proclaims

'All the earth doth worship thee,
The Father everlasting.'"

PROFESSOR E. G. CONKLIN, of the department of Biology of Princeton University, writes: "I regret to say that I have not seen the work and am therefore in no position to express an opinion of it as a whole. The extracts which you submit to me indicate that Professor Haeckel still maintains his well-known antagonism to the Christian religion, and it further indicates that he is inclined to attribute the present war to the futility of Christianity. In my opinion, the present period of great emotionalism in Europe presents a peculiarly unfavorable environment for a really judicious or scientific estimate of religion or of any other great system."

Ex-Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan writes: "Judging by the quotations which have been brought to my attention, Professor Haeckel's new book, entitled 'Eternity—Thoughts about Life and Death, Religion and the Doctrine of Evolution,' lacks the spirit which should characterize a philosophical discussion. He is evidently, and not unnaturally, laboring under the influence of an excitement which makes his words the vehicle of feeling rather than of reason.

"When he says that the war 'has reduced to absurdity the doctrines of providence and predestination,' he speaks as one who, under the shadow of a great sorrow, forgets the sun behind the cloud. To say that there is no God, merely because we are unable to understand how an all-wise and all-loving God permits such conditions as we see about us, is an expression of egotism which, while the author may be unconscious of his fault, cannot

Brush your Bread with Crisco

JUST as bread comes hot from the oven brush lightly all over with salted Crisco and the result will be a delicious, appetizing "butter" crust.

Crisco is so pure and wholesome that this simple use will improve the texture, better the color and enrich the taste of your batch.

CRISCO
For Frying-For Shortening
For Cake Making

Some cooks prefer to brush the bread with Crisco at the last rising instead of after baking. This gives an evenly browned, thin and tender crust with a rich and nutty flavor.

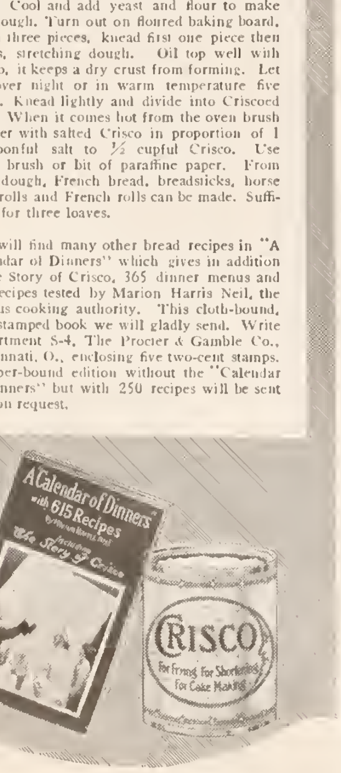
Never cover bread, while hot, with a cloth It sweats the bread, makes it soggy and less appetizing, and damages the flavor. Instead try brushing with Crisco and thus make good bread better.

Crisco Milk Bread
Rich in nourishment and will keep fresh longer

3 tablespoonfuls sugar 1 yeast cake
3 tablespoonfuls melted Crisco 1 quart milk
2 tablespoonfuls salt About 7 pints flour
(Use level measurements)

Mix yeast cake with one tablespoonful sugar. Heat milk, add remainder of sugar, Crisco and salt. Cool and add yeast and flour to make stiff dough. Turn out on floured baking board, cut in three pieces, knead first one piece then others, stretching dough. Oil top well with Crisco, it keeps a dry crust from forming. Let rise over night or in warm temperature five hours. Knead lightly and divide into Criscoed pans. When it comes hot from the oven brush all over with salted Crisco in proportion of 1 teaspoonful salt to ½ cupful Crisco. Use small brush or bit of paraffine paper. From same dough, French bread, breadsticks, horse shoe rolls and French rolls can be made. Sufficient for three loaves.

You will find many other bread recipes in "A Calendar of Dinners" which gives in addition to the Story of Crisco, 365 dinner menus and 615 recipes tested by Marion Harris Neil, the famous cooking authority. This cloth-bound, gold-stamped book we will gladly send. Write Department S-4, The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati, O., enclosing five two-cent stamps. A paper-bound edition without the "Calendar of Dinners" but with 250 recipes will be sent free on request.



impress those who are in a position to consider the subject calmly, and it will not impress those who are at present excited when the excitement has passed away.

"Philosophy does not attempt to form a rule from a single incident, and the philosopher, in laying down general rules for the guidance of a man under normal conditions, should not take counsel of the passions roused by a war which is without precedent or parallel.

"To say, as Professor Haeckel is quoted as saying, that 'this war proves the absurdity of the Christian principle of loving one's neighbor, and the futility of pacifism and Christian ethics,' is to read one's self, temporarily at least, out of the class of those who are entitled to ask consideration for their thoughts. It is no indictment of Christianity that a professing Christian may, in a moment of temptation,' do un-Christian things. Peter denied Christ at one time, and yet at other times was willing to prove his faith by the surrender of his life. So, it is unfair to condemn Christianity because men who profess it have been swept away from their ideals by the fierce passions aroused by the war. It is likewise unfair to accept the present conflict as proof that the teachings of Christ are unsound. The doctrine of brotherly love has not yet been tried in this war; the ethics of Christ should be tested before being discarded.

"If the war thus far has made any contribution to moral philosophy, it has supported Christianity rather than contradicted it, because we have seen to what extremes of cruelty and inhumanity man can go when he ignores the doctrines of love and brotherhood and becomes the disciple of brute force."

Professor Harnack, of the Königliche Bibliothek of Berlin, perhaps the most distinguished of European critics, writes that to his great regret he has not the time to give the subject attention.

THE REV. JUNIUS B. REMENSNYDER, the eminent Lutheran theologian, writes: "Professor Haeckel joins with our own ex-President Eliot in the attempt to use this war between Christian nations as an argument to lead us back to blind fatalism and impersonal naturalism. But two reasons, one theoretical, the other practical, refute their paganistic arguments. The philosophic reason is this: that God, after having given men Christian ideals, should not forcibly deter them from war, but let them learn by terrible experience its frightfulness, only illustrates his wisdom and justice. Thus alone will Christians learn to be at peace.

"And the practical refutation of Haeckel's futility of Christian ethics is shown in the wonderful strengthening of Christianity in the warring nations; the filling of the churches, the renewed reading of the Scriptures, the resort to prayer and the universal revival of religion. Thus, history ever shows, does the Christian religion, so often slain and buried by its critics, come from each death with a newer and more conquering march to more world-wide conquest."

Professor C. Alphonso Smith, of the University of Virginia, writes: "Darkness is the absence of light, not its negation. An eclipse is not a violation but a vindication of celestial law. We are living today in an eclipse. A book was once written to which many centuries, many personalities and many civilizations contributed their residual best. This book contains not one line of unconditioned prophecy. Its predictions, based on a definitive interpretation of human nature and human institutions, are many and clear-cut; but they are in every case conditioned on conduct. Every chronicled event in individual experience and in national development since the beginning of recorded history has been a verification of the truth proclaimed on every page of this book. We do not impeach the just sovereignty of natural law when a passenger train is wrecked by an obstacle on the track, nor do we mistrust gravity when an insecurely built house falls on its inmates. These things, deplorable as they may be, are confirmations, not contradictions. The destruction wrought by wind and wave is but the spelling backward of forces which, recognized and obeyed, have carried and will carry our cargoes to assured havens. The moral law of Christ justifies its rightness and its adequacy in two ways: by the blessings that it confers when obeyed, and by the miseries that it entails when disobeyed. Men have the international mind, but not the international heart.

"Christianity, like gravity, will be disproved and justly discredited when, and not until, it makes exceptions in the operation of its laws, whether these be the laws of sanction or of warning. The principle is not affected by the number or numbers of those within its orbit. Attack huma and human institutions as you do not attack the divine law and by which alone humanity loftiest heights and measures it depths."

ALTHOUGH three month elapsed since Dr. Haeck appeared in Europe, it seem still practically unknown here, a little is known to a few schola has apparently created no im while in Europe the critics also have strangely passed it by.

Dr. Samuel Schulman, an Jewish rabbi in New York, probably what is a clue to th ference, in a letter to the which he characterizes Professor as "a type of scientist who a dogmatist on matters on whic speak with no more authori any one else," and he adds: "I you what illusion this war ha away—the flattering unction soul which a materialistic sci dinned into our ears for the years, namely, that men becon and more civilized because of tery over nature which enabl to increase their material This war proves that the civili the head is but the smallest human culture, but that, i wars are ever to end, humanit must be educated. Men m seriously and exemplify in th the faith in a God that wants love one another. It is Haeck that have been swept away war, and not the God of Juda Christianity."

The conclusion of the whole obviously that Haeckel's "cha Christianity" has fallen flat. the principal reasons is that spiritual movement is stirring European countries, France, G England and the rest, and nations have begun to look to the only Power who can bring of the prevailing chaos and peace to the world. If Professor had taken note of the spiritual that are now going on in the of Europe, of the deep and wi religious revival that has pe even to the trenches, and filling the churches as they been filled in a generation, h probably never have written timely book.

Shall Alaska Be Divided?

CONTINUING FRANK G. CARPENTER'S NARRATIVE

Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

SHALL the tail wag the dog? This is one of the questions that is agitating Alaska. The dog is the main body of the country. It has more than nine-tenths of the territory and potentially it is a world of the future. It embraces all the land west of the long line of the international boundary that runs north and south between us and British Columbia, coming almost to the Pacific Ocean, where the Malaspina Glacier slopes off from Mount St. Elias into the sea. The tail is Southeastern Alaska, comprising the strip of coast and the Alexander Archipelago lying south and east of the boundary extension. This section contains much less than one-tenth of the land, but, just now, it has the most people, and its industries are producing more money than any other part of Alaska of quadruple its size.

necticuts, or a couple of Switzerlands, and leave some to spare. Nevertheless, it compares in size to the rest of Alaska as a postage stamp does to a bank note, and as far as area is concerned it would seem that the dog could not help but wag the tail.

The matter has come up in connection with the apportionment of the taxes and revenues of Alaska. The most of the revenues are derived from this section of the country and the larger part is from the forests. Southeastern Alaska is heavily wooded. Uncle Sam charges a dollar a thousand as stumpage for all the timber that is cut on the government reserves, and the receipts are supposed to go back to the people for the making of roads. Such revenues from Southeastern Alaska last year were about $60,000, but the legislature, a majority of which comes from the body of the territory, has so divided the money that three-fourths of it goes to road work which is outside this region, and the people object. Indeed, the feeling is so intense that a party has arisen which advocates that Southeastern Alaska break away from the main body of the territory and become a territory of its own. It demands that it be a separate political entity. A committee of six has been appointed to investigate the subject, and it will probably be brought up before Congress this session.

THERE are many reasons why Southeastern Alaska will eventually be a separate territory. In size it compares favorably with Indiana or South Carolina. I have already shown that it is larger than some very important states of the Union. It is cut off geographically from the rest of Alaska; and it has interests which are different from those of any other part of the territory. It has its own climate, and in comparison with the country north of the Yukon River it might be called tropic or temperate Alaska.

The Japanese Current, the gulf stream of the Pacific, sweeps through it and forms a great hot-water plant that holds Jack Frost in check and seldom allows him to approach zero, even in the midst of winter. The coldest weather of the region is as mild as that of many of our states south of Mason and Dixon's line. Juneau, where I am writing, has Januarys warmer than those of St. Louis, and the climate of Ketchikan is like that of Seattle. Throughout the whole region the summers are pleasant and the rainfall is so heavy that the land is green all the year round. Indeed, there are but few signs of winter, except the snow on the mountains. The slopes of the hills near the water are so warm that the snow melts as it falls and the sledding of the children is due to the heavy frosts which cover the board walks of the town, and not to the snow.

For the past month I have been traveling along the coast and in and out among the islands, and the flowers and trees are a series of surprises. The topography of the country is much like that of the Alleghanies or the Blue Ridge, but the forests are thicker and the vegetation is denser. Nearly everywhere the bushes are so thick that it would be impossible to make your way through them without an ax or a knife. The forest begins at the water's edge and runs to the snow line, which is about a thousand feet above the sea. For that distance the trees are choked with undergrowth; but above it the heavy vegetation disappears, and there is a patch of grass or moss that runs up to the line of perpetual snow.

There is moss everywhere in the forest, and this is so thick and so spongy that your feet sink in to the ankles. Many of the trees are hung with mosses. The chief trees are evergreens. There are many spruce, and red and yellow cedars, including a vast deal of timber that would make wood pulp and which in the future will probably supply the newspaper demands of the states. As it is, the Indians use the cedar bark to make rope, and they tear out the inner part of it and weave it into baskets and cloaks.

AND then the wild flowers! They grow everywhere. There are Alpine geraniums, goldenrod and buttercups, and bluebells with cups an inch long. There are yellow violets and red daisies, and lilies as black as ink. There are rosy laurel and pink bryanthus and little blue forget-me-nots such as we have in the states. Southeastern Alaska has three varieties of orchids, and it has other air plants as well.

Southeastern Alaska is a land of berries. The salmonberry is ripe throughout the summer. It is twice as large as the largest raspberry, and it tastes much the same. There are also raspberries that grow on the ground, and cranberries of several varieties. There are wild strawberries and blueberries and red huckleberries. I have already written of the cultivated fruit, telling you of the many crosses with the native strawberry that have been made at the Sitka experiment station. Strawberries are raised commercially at Haines and they are exported to Juneau and other towns. They are ripe throughout the summer, and are of a character that would command a ready market in any United States city.

As to the cultivated parts of Southeastern Alaska, they are so few at this writing that they are hardly worth mentioning. In the thousand-mile ride on the steamer from Seattle to Skagway you do not see a dozen farms as big as a bedspread; and in most places the land is so steep that it reminds you of the farms of West Virginia, where it is said the corn is planted with shotguns from the opposite hills. Nevertheless, if you go back into the valleys you will find little cultivated patches where the farmers have settled.

All of these farms seem to me pitifully small, and I doubt if they offer any great opportunities to their owners. The land is so rough and so wooded that it costs several hundred dollars an acre to clear it, and, moreover, the crops will always have to compete with the grain and food products brought in from Washington and Oregon by the steamers that call almost daily at the principal ports. The great possibilities of southeastern Alaska lie in its fish, its woods and its minerals.

The greater part of Southeastern Alaska is practically unknown. How many of you have heard of Prince of Wales Island? It is 140 miles long and 40 miles wide. It is almost half as big as the state of Massachusetts, and it has great copper mines that are now working as gold mines and quarries of marble. Revillagigedo, on which Ketchikan lies, is fifty miles long, and Baranof and Chichagof are, together, of about the same size as Prince of Wales Island. Gold and other minerals have been found upon all of these islands.

On the opposite coast lies Sumdum Bay, where the great Juneau gold belt may be said to begin. This belt is "the Rand of the Northwest." It runs northeast and southwest along the coast for something like 200 miles. Juneau lies in its center and Douglas Island, from which $60,000,000 worth of gold has been taken, is a part of it. The Juneau gold region has already produced over $70,000,000; it contains vast quantities of low grade ore, and it promises to be a mining or gold manufacturing center for many generations to come.

THESE very instructive and entertaining articles by Mr. Carpenter are being followed by our readers with close interest, and some have made inquiries about various conditions described by this experienced traveler. It may interest more than one reader to know that a resident of Porto Rico takes issue with Mr. Carpenter as to the size of the island on which Ketchikan is situated, which was described as fifty miles long and twenty miles wide in one of these articles. Our correspondent corrects this by giving the dimensions for Porto Rico as 100 miles long east and west, and 40 miles wide at the west end narrower at the east end, with a total area of 3,435 square miles. Others will be relieved to know that the sixty-mile fish line mentioned some time back is not a figment of the writer's imagination. The line, however, is not a continuous string reaching from the fisherman on the bank to a point sixty miles out in the ocean. There is what might be called a trunk line held upon the surface by buoys, and from this depend a large number of branch lines reaching to great depths, the whole system totaling the length named by Mr. Carpenter. Mr. Carpenter makes this statement on the information given to him by veteran fishermen in Alaska.

READER, Connecticut. I have been a church member for about twenty years, and actively engaged in the work almost all that time. I was a Gospel singer and the Lord used my voice to help a great many, but somehow I got out of the work and lost interest in everything. I attended church as usual and felt uncomfortable if I stayed away, and I taught my class just the same because they wouldn't let me give it up; but there was no interest in the work. I tried to pray about it, but seemed to receive no help. I listened to the best sermons with absolutely no concern. I read my Bible and seemed to get nothing from it, and it seemed that my prayers went no higher than my head. Were I unconcerned I would think the Spirit had been withdrawn from me and that my case was hopeless; but I am dreadfully concerned, yet I do not know what to do. Can you advise me and tell me what the trouble is? for I want to get back into the fellowship again as I once was.

Suppose you try this plan—and we are sure it is worth trying: Set yourself for a day to think not about yourself, but about Christ. Think not how you feel, but how he feels. Read one of the Gospels through; read the crucifixion narrative in all four Gospels; read the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah. Then do the same thing the next day, and the next. You will find yourself feeling sorry not for yourself, but for him, because you have disappointed him so in letting your love grow cold. This "godly sorrow" is repentance. He will show you where you have particularly grieved and displeased him; he will freely forgive; he will cleanse your heart of its stains; he will make you love him again as you yield yourself to his power. Then begin to think of others. Help them. Cheer them. Save them. Please him by doing all you can for them. Put your new love for him into new service for others, and the old love and joy will come back. Read Gal. 3; Gal. 5 : 22-23; Isa 40; Isa. 43; Isa. 44 : 1-4, 21-28; Isa. 54; Isa. 55.

H. H., Cedar Springs, Mo. The same subject is discussed in Matt. 19. The question of remarriage is not considered. There were two schools of interpretation, that of Shammai, which was strict, and that of Hillel, which was much less so, and commentators hold that it was to correct the abuses tolerated by the latter school that our Lord dealt with the subject as plainly as he did.

Mrs. M. C. S., Deer Lodge, Tenn. According to tradition, the boy who carried the basket containing the loaves and fishes (with which Jesus miraculously fed five thousand) was Ben Ezra, the little son of Mariamne, a sister of Philip, one of the disciples.

L. N G., Sterling, Kan. There is no present question of abandoning the Monroe doctrine.

Enquirer, Somerset, Pa. The time of the fulfilment of prophecy is in God's keeping, not ours, and it is futile for men to attempt to fathom his secrets. Many learned men have written concerning the millennium, and a number of them have set dates for its beginning, but all have proved to be wrong.

L. M N., Lathrop, Mo. Evangelist Billy Sunday is an ordained minister of the Presbyterian Church. He is, however, broadly evangelical in his services to meet the needs of all denominations.

B. L. W., Greenville, Ill. We have never seen the name of the author of the poem you mention.

A. M. H., Walum, N. D. 1. In the passage in John 16 : 23, in which our Lord speaks of secret prayer, he was rebuking those who made their prayers in public in an ostentatious fashion, and who, like the Pharisees, loved to be commended for their piety. He did not mean, however, to imply that people should always pray in private; his own prayers in the presence of his disciples showed this, and besides, there are many passages in the New Testament showing that God approves of his people meeting together for prayer. 2. We have already discussed the overworking of such phrases as "as it were," "so to speak," and so forth. Certainly one is wiser not to cultivate their use, either in conversation or public address. 3. There can be no place for war in the Christian doctrine if we accept Christ's injunction to "Love one another." If the spirit of brotherhood existed internationally, there could be no war. 4 The matter of water-drinking should be referred to a physician, who can inform himself as to the peculiarities of the case.

C. A. S., Philadelphia, Pa. 1. The subject you mention is purely controversial and could not be settled by any discussion in the Mail-Bag. At the first great council of the church, when the question was discussed whether the Gentile converts should be required to obey the Jewish law, certain observances were laid down (see Acts 15), and the observance of the Jewish Sabbath was not among them. The Gentile Christians do not appear to have ever kept the Jewish Sabbath. The first day of the week was uniformly the day of religious meeting and abstinence from secular tasks. 2 There is no passage in the Scripture which justifies the doctrine of purgatory, nor anything to show that there will be an opportunity for repentance after death. 3. The price of "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" is $1.

Anxious, Minn. See answer to H. H., Cedar Springs, Mo.

J. W. B., Winterburn, W. Va There was one man who received the apostolate in a remarkable manner, namely, Paul, who was miraculously added to the number of the early Christian society. It should be noted that the term "apostle" is employed in the New Testament as a general name for Christian ministers or teachers qualified to preach the Word. There were doubtless many secret followers. Joseph of Arimathea (John 19 : 38) was "a disciple, but secretly." Nicodemus came by stealth at night, and Mark relates an incident concerning himself (Mark 14 : 51, 52) which might lead to the inference that he also was a follower in secret.

Mrs. W. W., Crystal Lake, Ill. The sin against the Holy Ghost is believed to have been attributing the works of the Spirit to Satanic agency.

B. M L., Suit, N. C. The passage in Matt. 13 44 is really self-explanatory. The parables of the hidden treasure and the pearl of great price were addressed to the disciples in the course of a discussion on the subject of personal religion. The first describes the case of a man who finds a treasure without looking for it. By some accidental circumstances he becomes aware that a treasure is buried in his neighbor's field, unknown to the latter, and the finder immediately plans to secure the treasure for himself. He does not mean to do so without purchase, however, but, using the guile of the world, he plans to buy the field so that when he possesses it the treasure will be his. This is the case of a man who is possessed of the outward form of Christianity but is unacquainted with its power. Reasoning from this illustration of the man who sells all he has in order to buy that field for a mere worldly treasure, how much more would one who has suddenly found what a surpassing treasure is God's love as manifested through Jesus Christ be willing to sacrifice for the assurance of that love and the advancement of the Kingdom on earth. In this parable, as in several others, worldly wisdom is instanced simply to show that while such wisdom is used for selfish purposes, equal wisdom could be used by the "children of light" for the highest purposes, without reproach on the ground of selfishness.

J. W. P., Libertytown, Md. 1. The official church in Germany is the Lutheran. 2. The iron cross is a token of high distinction for bravery.

A Reader in Waynesboro, Pa., in whose home the Christian Herald is a regular visitor, is tempted to proclaim the merits of his favorite journal, but hesitates and, apropos of his hesitancy, relates this anecdote of John Bunyan: "A certain lady came to the author of 'Pilgrim's Progress' and said: 'Mr. Bunyan, you preached a good sermon today.' 'Yes,' was Mr. Bunyan's naive reply, 'the devil told me that before I left the pulpit.'" The story is apt, but we think most Christians would prefer the lowlier attitude which the old couplet by Cowper so well describes:

> "And Satan trembles when he sees
> The weakest saint upon his knees."

Prayer is the most effective spiritual weapon, and the longer we live the more this fact is impressed upon us

J. C., Fairfield, Vt. 1. The passage in Deut. 32: 30 is an express promise given to Israel, on condition of their faithful allegiance to God, that they would be enabled to overcome their enemies, as the Lord would be with them to give them the victory. 2. Elisabeth, the mother of John the Baptist, was a kinswoman, presumably a cousin, of Mary the mother of Jesus (see Luke 1: 36). 3. The words "hid himself," in John 8: 59, are held by many authorities—including Alford, Tischendorf, Meyer, Tregelles and others—to be an interpolation, and the fact is incontestable that, while they appear in some of the ancient manuscripts, they are wanting in others. Some modern commentators suggest that the rds should be bracketed in the current Bibl er- sions. 4. The incident of Jesus walking he sea (see Mark 6: 47-52) is one which carr its own lesson. He saw from the land that ey were being hard buffeted by the storm, a he came across the waves to reassure the of safety, and to dispel their fears by letting em know that he was there. Their amazeme at the divine power over wind and wave, and eir sudden increase of faith, may be gathered om Matt. 14: 33, which relates how they or-shiped him, saying "of a truth thou a he Son of God."

Reader, Mabton, Wash. While looking a he Christian Herald I read a topic fo he Young People's meetings: "Why oin the Church?" And so I ask, wha encouragement have they to join when is one continual running with socials, uppers, dinners, in fact anything to ke money or to get it from the public t ay the minister's salary and keep u he church, instead of doing as they ar old in the New Testament? Why shou n't members take care of their own c ch family? Why should they expect the ublic to do it? I heard a man say t ne who was soliciting money for the mi er, "I don't go to your church. I don see why you should expect me to help su ort him."

This is an overdrawn picture, yet it i ne which we frequently hear described by c ain people outside of the church who do not u erstand the spirit or purpose of the c ch methods and are apt to criticize unf ly. While it is possibly true that in some chu hes the social side is too strongly emphasize the fact remains that it is a very importan adjunct of church life, and rightly so. A he proper time and place, social reunions a means of keeping up friendly interc se among the members, as well as stimul ng interest in the spiritual and material pr ss of the church and of bringing others int he fold. They should not be regarded as a l timate source of revenue for the spiritual rk of the church; the members themselves s ld be willing to bear that burden. We kn of churches that follow this rule strictly, ry member esteeming it a privilege to bear hi vn part. We would remind "Reader" that C ist himself set the example of feeding the ltitudes, who sat down to hear him after d. Surely we want no better example an no stronger recommendation.

M. D. R., Dubuque, Iowa. I have read ly a statement by a leading writer t he effect that war is a necessary evil, tha hr world makes progress through stru le, and that the energy of the race must ve some means of expending itself—hen international conflicts. How are we egard such a theory?

It is not a new proposition, but is as as the race itself. Nations claim room to ex d, new fields for their commerce, and addit nal territory for their increasing populations All of these, even if we regard them as reaso le, could be accomplished peaceably and isfactorily, were the rulers of the nations g ed by the principles of righteousness and ju e. But greed and selfishness are still domin in the world. The weaker is forced to yield t he stronger. See the causes and motives of v as described in James 4: 1-3. Do not these ly in almost every war, and even today? Instead of slaughtering each other, the n ns were to expend their energies in fighting verty, industrial slavery, disease, vice and c e, ignorance, drunkenness, selfishness, co ption in high places, inefficiency and unem yment, and a host of other evils, they wou be doing God's will and the best kind of s ce to their fellow men.

W. W., Columbia, Mo. Peter and John re put in prison on the complaint of the rul of the Jews and the Sadducees, as explain in Acts 4. The specific charge on that occ on was that they had preached the resurre on. On being released the disciples were em dened to go on preaching and healing, an he wonderful results of their ministry stirr up the Sadducees a second time. On the pre us occasion, they had been commanded b he high priest to cease preaching in the na of Jesus (see chapter 5: 28); but they ha ot pledged themselves to obey this comman nd were bolder than before. On this secon mprisonment, they were beaten again an eleased, with a renewal of the warning, ch they again decided to disregard, trusti te divine protection for their ministry.

Mrs. E. A. B., Kokomo, Ind. The ser of articles entitled "Through Gates of Pear as stated in the author's preface, is a visi or dream rather than a story. It belongs t he same class of religious literature as "Be nd the Gates," "Gates Ajar," and "Pilg 's Progress." It may be regarded as a spi ual allegory, the product of a highly sensitiv nature which has been led into many st ge experiences during a period of invalidism. he literary gift of the author has enabled her ke Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, to record her s sations with wonderful skill and beauty.

By GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL LUTZ

"I WENT out to catch cattle thieves," he said with a sigh, "but I found there were other kinds of thieves abroad. It's all in the day's work. I'm not tired now." And he smiled at her with beautiful reverence.

Margaret as she watched him could not help thinking the lines in his face had softened and strengthened since she had first seen him, and her eyes let him know that she was glad he had come.

"And so you will really come to us, and it isn't going to be asking too much?" he said wistfully. "You can't think what it's going to be to the men—to us! And Mom Wallis is so excited she can hardly get her work done. If you had said no I would be almost afraid to go back." He laughed, but she could see there was deep earnestness under his tone.

"Indeed I will come," said Margaret. "I'm just looking forward to it. I'm going to bring Mrs. Wallis a new bonnet like one I made for mother; and I'm going to teach her how to make corn gems and steamed apple dumplings. I'm bringing some songs and some music for the violin; and I've got something for you to help me do, too, if you will."

He smiled tenderly down on her. What a wonderful girl she was, to be willing to come out to the old shack among a lot of rough men and one uncultured old woman and make them happy, when she was fit for the finest in the land!

"You're wonderful!" he said, taking her hand with a quick pressure for good-by. "You make every one want to be his best."

He hurried out to his horse and rode away in the moonlight, and Margaret went up to her "mountain window" and watched him far out on the trail, her heart swelling with an unnamed gladness over his last words.

"O God, keep him, and help him to make good!" she prayed.

CHAPTER XXI

THE visit to the camp was a time to be remembered long by all the inhabitants of the bunk house, and even by Margaret herself. Margaret wondered Friday evening as she sat up late working away braiding a lovely gray bonnet out of folds of maline, and fashioning it into form for Mom Wallis, why she was looking forward to the visit with so much more real pleasure than she had done to the one the week before at the Fort. And so subtle is the heart of a maid that she never really fathomed the real reason.

The Fort of course was curious and interesting as being something utterly new in her experience. It was comparatively luxurious, and there were pleasant, cultured people there, more from her own social class in life. But it was going to be such fun to surprise Mom Wallis with that bonnet and see her old face light up when she saw herself in the little folding three-leaved mirror she was taking along with her and meant to leave for Mom Wallis' boudoir. She was quite excited over selecting some little thing for each one of the men—books, pictures, a piece of music, a bright cushion and a pile of picture magazines. It made a big bundle when she had them all together and she was dubious if she ought to try to carry them all; but Bud, whom she consulted on the subject, said loftily it "wasn't a flea-bite for the Kid; he could carry anything on a horse."

Bud was just a little jealous to have his beloved teacher away from home so much, and rejoiced greatly when Gardley, Friday afternoon, suggested that he come along, too. He made quick time to his home and secured a hasty permission and wardrobe, and appeared like a footman on his father's old horse, when they were half a mile down the trail.

Mom Wallis was out at the door to greet her guest when she arrived, for Margaret had chosen to make her visit last from Friday afternoon after school until early Monday morning.

The one fear she had entertained about coming had been set at rest on the way when Gardley told her that Pop Wallis was off on one of his long trips selling cattle, and would probably not return for a week. Margaret, much as she trusted Gardley and the men, could not help dreading to meet Pop Wallis again.

There was a new trimness about the old bunk house. The clearing had been cleaned up and made neat, the grass cut, some vines set out and trained up limply about the door, and the windows shone with Mom Wallis's washing.

Mom Wallis herself was wearing her best white apron, stiff with starch, her lace collar, and her hair in her best imitation of the way Margaret had fixed it. But the one great difference Margaret noticed in the old woman was the illuminating smile on her face. Mom Wallis had learned how to let the glory gleam through all the hard sordidness of her life, and make earth brighter for those about her.

The curtains certainly made a great difference in the looks of the bunk house, together with a few other changes. The men had made some chairs, three of them, one out of a barrel; and together they had upholstered them roughly. The cots around the walls were blazing with their red blankets folded smoothly and neatly over them, and on the floor in front of the hearth, which had been scrubbed, Gardley had spread a Navajo blanket he had bought of an Indian.

The fireplace was piled with logs ready for the lighting at night, and from somewhere a lamp had been rigged up and polished till it shone in the setting sun that slanted long rays in at the shining windows.

The men had been washed and combed, and huddled at the back of the bunk house for an hour watching the road, and now they came forward awkwardly to greet their guest, their horny hands scrubbed to an unbelievable whiteness. They did not say much, but they looked their pleasure, and Margaret greeted every one as if he were an old friend, the charming part about it all being, to the men, that she remembered every one's name and used it.

Bud hovered in the background and watched everybody with starry eyes. Bud was having the time of his life. He preferred the teacher's visiting the camp rather than the Fort. The "Howdy, sonny!" which he had received from the men, and the "Make yourself at home, Will!" from Gardley had given him great joy, and the whole thing seemed somehow to link him to the teacher in a most distinguishing manner.

SUPPER was ready almost immediately, and Mom Wallis had done her best to make it appetizing. There was a lamb stew with potatoes, and fresh corn bread with coffee. The men ate with a relish, and watched their guest of honor as if she had been an angel come down to abide with them for a season. There was a tablecloth on the old table, too, a white tablecloth. It looked remarkably like an old sheet, to be sure, with a seam through the middle where it had been worn and turned and sewed together at the ends; but it was a tablecloth now, and a marvel to the men. And the wonder about Margaret was that she could eat at such a table and make it seem as though that tablecloth were the finest damask, and the two-tined forks the heaviest of silver.

After the supper was cleared away and the lamp lighted the gifts were brought out. A book of Scotch poetry for LEADERSHIP, after all, gravitates to the fittest. And Service must ever be the measure of that fitness. When a man ceases to serve his community, his fellow-men, his value is lost. So it is with motor cars.

Leadership

In one of several automobile classes the Maxwell aims and always has aimed to give that full measure of service which shall proclaim it a leader. Every effort of our organization has been toward that end.

Economy, efficiency, beauty and comfort—these are the qualities dignified by an inbuilt honor, to which Maxwell service is sequel. And these are the qualities that have set the Maxwell apart, and, in its class, marked it with the seal of distinction.

Maxwell Motor Cars are honest, worthy products. They are made by folks who have not attained absolute perfection, but who strive earnestly to maintain the eminence and good will they have earned.

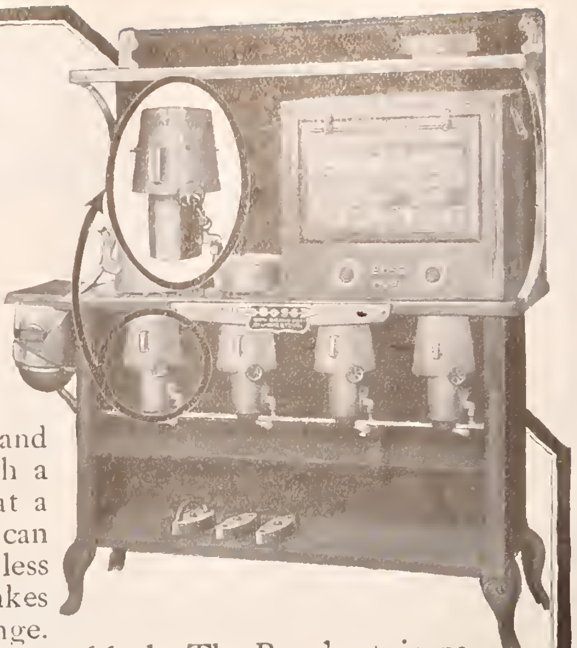
Every Meal on the Minute



The Boss Oil-Air Stove fires up so quickly and furnishes such a hot flame that a complete meal can be cooked in less time than it takes to heat a coal range.

There's no lugging of fuel. The Boss heats irons, cooks, boils and bakes without heating the kitchen.

The Patented Oil-Air Burner burns nearly 1000 times as much air as oil. It is specially designed to save fuel and give absolute cooking satisfaction. The Boss is handsomely built in 2, 3, 4 or 5 burner types. It is complete and easily operated.

ALWAYS BOSS AHEAD
REG U S PAT OFF
STOVES and OVENS

The Boss Glass Door Oven is a real help to any kitchen and to any oil, gas or gasoline stove. Built so as to distribute the heat evenly and effectively, there is never a cause to open the door to turn pans or pastry around, nor to see when the crust is crisp and brown—just look in the glass door and save the loss in falling cakes which is usually caused by opening oven doors.

Jasper Kemp, bound in tartan covers, "The Campbell Clan"; a small illustrated pamphlet of Niagara Falls for Big Jim, because he had said he wanted to see the place and never could manage it; a little pictured folder of Washington City for Big Jim; a book of old ballad music for the Fiddling Boss; a book of jokes for Fadeaway Forbes; a framed picture of a beautiful shepherd dog for Stocky; a big red ruffled denim pillow for Croaker, because when she was there before he was always complaining about the seats being hard; a great blazing crimson pennant bearing the name "Harvard" in big letters for Fudge, because she had remembered he was from Boston; and for Mom Wallis a framed text beautifully painted in water colors, done in rustic letters twined with stray forgetmenots, the words: "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Margaret had made that during the week, and framed it in a simple raffia braid of brown and green.

It was marvelous how those men liked their presents; and while they were examining them and laughing about them and putting their pictures and Mom Wallis's text on the walls, and the pillow on a bunk, and the pennant over the fireplace, Margaret shyly held out a tiny box to Gardley.

"I thought perhaps you would let me give you this," she said. "It isn't much, it isn't even new, and it has some marks in it; but I thought it might help with your new undertaking."

Gardley took it with a lighting of his face and opened the box. It was a little soft leather-bound Testament, showing the marks of usage, yet not worn. It was a tiny thing, very thin, easily fitting in a vest pocket and not a burden to carry. He took the little book in his hand, removed the silken rubber band that bound it, and turned the leaves reverently in his fingers, noting that there were pencil marks here and there. His face was all emotion as he looked down at the giver.

"I thank you," he said in a low tone, glancing about to see that no one was noticing them. "I shall prize it greatly. It surely will help. I will read it every day. Was that what you wanted? And I will carry it with me always."

HIS voice was very earnest, and he looked at her as though she had given him a fortune. With another glance about at the preoccupied room—even Bud was busy studying Jasper Kemp's oldest gun—he snapped the band on the book again and put it carefully in his inner breast pocket. The box he shut and put in the side pocket of his coat. The book would henceforth travel next his heart and be his guide. She thought he meant her to understand that, as he put out his hand unobtrusively and pressed her fingers gently with a quick, low "Thank you!"

Then Mom Wallis's bonnet was brought out and tied on her, and the poor old woman blushed like a girl when she stood with meek hands folded at her waist, and looked primly about on the family for their approval, at Margaret's request. But that was nothing to the way she stared when Margaret got out the threefold mirror and showed her herself in the new headgear. She trotted away at last, the wonderful bonnet in one hand, the box in the other, a look of awe on her face, and Margaret heard her murmur as she put it away, "Glory! Me! Glory!"

Then Margaret had to read one or two of the poems for Jasper Kemp, while they all sat and listened to her Scotch and marveled at her. A woman like that condescending to come to visit them!

She gave a lesson in note-reading to the Fiddling Boss, pointing one by one with her white fingers to the notes until he was able to creep along and pick out "Suwanee River" and "Old Folks at Home" to the intense delight of the audience.

Margaret never knew just how it was that she came to be telling the men a story, one she had read not long ago in a magazine, a story with a thrilling national interest and a keen personal touch, that searched the heart of man; but they listened as they had never listened to anything in their es before.

And then there was singing, ore singing, until it bade fair to be mo ng before they slept, and the little te her was weary indeed when she lay dov on the cot in Mom Wallis's room, er having knelt beside the old wo an and prayed.

The next day there was a wonc ful ride with Gardley to the canyon o he cave-dwellers, and a coming hon to the apple dumplings she had ta ht Mom Wallis to make before she nt away. And all day Gardley anc he had talked over the play she was ge ng up at the school, Gardley sugge ng about costumes, and tree bough or scenery, and promising to help in ny way she wanted. Then after su er there were jokes and songs aroun he big fire, and some pop-corn one o he men had gone a long ride to get at day. They called for another s y, too, and it was forthcoming.

It was Sunday morning after b k-fast, however, that Margaret sud ly wondered how she was going to n ke the day helpful and different fron he other days.

She stood for a moment lookin ut of the clear little window thought ly, with just the shadow of a sigh o er lips, and as she turned back to he room she met Gardley's questi ng glance.

"Are you homesick?" he asked th a sorry smile. "This must all be ry different from what you are a s-tomed to."

"Oh, no, it isn't that." She si ed brightly. "I'm not a baby for hom ut I do get a bit homesick about cl ch time. Sunday is such a strange d to me without a service."

"Why not have one, then?" he g-gested eagerly. "We can sing a — you could—do the rest!"

Her eyes lighted at the sugge n, and she cast a quick questioning g ce at the men. Would they stanc or that sort of thing?

Gardley followed her glance nd caught her meaning.

"Let them answer for themsel s," he said quickly in a low tone, and n, raising his voice:

"Speak up, men. Do you wa to have church? Miss Earle here is h e-sick for a service, and I suggest at we have one, and she conduct it."

"Sure!" said Jasper Kemp, his e lighting. "I'll miss my guess i he can't do better than the parson we ad last Sunday. Get into your s ts, boys, we're goin' to church."

Margaret's face was a study o m-barrassment and delight as she sa he alacrity with which the men turn to get ready for "church." Her ek brain turned over the possibility of at she could read or say to help this st ge congregation thus suddenly thrust on her.

It was a testimony to her upbri ng by a father whose great business ife was to preach the Gospel that she er thought once of hesitating or decl ng the opportunity—but welcomed as an opportunity and only depre ed her unreadiness for the work.

The men stirred about and pu on their coats, furtively brushing eir hair, and Long Bill insisted that om Wallis put on her new bonnet, ch she obligingly did, and sat down re-fully in the barrel chair, her ds neatly crossed in her lap, supre ly happy. It really was wonderful at a difference that bonnet made in om Wallis.

GARDLEY arranged a comfor le seat for Margaret at the le and put in front of her one of he hymn books she had brought. n, after she was seated, he took the ir beside her, and brought out the tle Testament from his breast po et, gravely laying it on the hymn boo

Margaret met his eyes with a lo of quick appreciation. It gave the a thrill of wonder and delight to hav im do this simple little thing for her. nd the smile that passed between m was beautiful to see. Long Bill tu ed away his head and looked out o he window with an improvised snee to excuse the sudden mist that came to his eyes.

Margaret chose "My Faith I ks

U to Thee" for the first hymn because th Fiddling Boss could play it, and w e he was tuning up his fiddle she ha ily wrote out two more copies of th words. And so the queer service st ted, with a quaver of the old fiddle, an the clear voices of Margaret and G lley leading off, while the men gu led on their way behind, and Mom W lis in her new gray bonnet, with her ha all fluffed, softly gray under it, an her eyes shining like a girl's.

) absorbed in the song were they all th they failed to hear the sound of a ho e coming into the clearing. But ju as the last words of the final verse di away the door of the bunk house sw g open and there in the doorway st d Pop Wallis!

e men sprang to their feet with one ac rd, ominous frowns on their brows, an poor old Mom Wallis sat petrified wh e she was, the smile of relaxation fro n on her face, a look of fear growin n her tired old eyes.

ow Pop Wallis, through an unusual co bination of circumstances, had been fo ome hours without liquor and was co paratively sober as he stood staring an zedly at the group around his fir de. Perhaps because he had been so ong without his usual stimulant hi nind was weakened and things appe ed as a strange vision to him. At an rate he stood and stared, and as he lo d from one to another of the me at the beautiful stranger, and then to e strangely unfamiliar face of his wi in her new bonnet, his eyes took on a ghtened look. He slowly took his ha from the door frame and passed it ov his eyes, then looked again, from on o another, and back to his glorified wi argaret had half risen at her end of th table, and Gardley stood beside he as if to reassure her, but Pop Wallis wa not looking at any of them any mo . His eyes were on his wife. He pa d his hand once more over his ey and took one step gropingly into th oom, a hand reached out in front of m as if he were not sure but he mi t run into something on the way, th other on his forehead, a dazed look in s face.

Vhy, Mom!—that ain't really—you, no is it?" he said in a gentle, insinuati voice like one long unaccustomed ma ng a hasty prayer.

e tone made a swift change in the ol woman. She gripped her bony ha s tight and a look of beatific joy ca into her wrinkled face.

'es, it's really me, Pop!" she said wi a kind of triumphant ring to her vo .

But.—but—you're right here, ain't yo You ain't dead, an'—an'—gone to gl-o-o-ry, be you? You're right her "

'es, I'm right here, Pop. I ain't de ! But—Pop—Glory's come to me!" Glory?" repeated the man dazedly, "G ry?" and he gazed around the ro and took in the new curtains, the pi res on the wall, the cushions and ch s, and the bright shining windows. "Y u don't mean it's heaven, do you, Mo? 'Cause I better go back—I do b'long in heav'n. Why, Mom, it n't be glory, cause it's the same old bu house—outside anyhow."

'es, it's the same old bunk house, an it ain't heaven, but it's goin' to be. The glory's come all right. You sit lown, Pop, we're goin' to have ch h, and this is my new bonnet. Sh brung it. This is the new school tea er, Miss Earle, and she's goin' to ha church. She done it all! You sit do and listen."

p Wallis took a few hesitating ste into the room and dropped into th earest chair. He looked at Marga as if she might be an angel holding pen the portal to a kingdom in th ky. He looked and wondered and ad red, but then he looked back to his lorified old wife again in wonder.

sper Kemp shut the door, and the co any dropped back into their pla s. Margaret, because of her deep em rrassment, and a kind of inward tre bling that had taken possession of he announced another hymn.

was a solemn little service, and qu unique, with a brief simple prayer, an an expository reading of the story of blind man from the sixth chapter of hn. The men sat attentively, their eyes upon her face as she read, but Pop Wallis sat staring at his wife, a strange light upon his scarred old face, the wickedness and cunning all faded out, and only awe and wonder written there.

In the early dawning of the pink and silver morning Margaret went back to her work, Gardley riding by her side, and Bud riding at a discreet distance behind, now and then going off at a tangent after a stray cottontail. It was wonderful what good sense Bud seemed to have on occasion.

The horse that Margaret rode, a sturdy little Western pony with nerve and grit and a gentle common sense for humans, was to remain with her in Ashland, a gift from the men of the bunk house. During the week that followed Lieutenant Forsythe came riding over from the Fort with a beautiful shining saddle horse for her use during her stay in the West; but when he went riding back to the Fort the shining saddle horse was still in his train, riderless, for Margaret told him that she already had a horse of her own. Neither had Margaret accepted the invitation to the Fort for the next week-end. She had other plans for the Sabbath, and that week there appeared on all the trees and posts about the town, and on the trails, a little notice of a Bible class and vesper service to be held in the schoolhouse on the following Sabbath afternoon; and so Margaret, true daughter of her minister-father, took up her mission in Ashland for the Sabbaths that were to follow, for the school board had agreed with alacrity to the use of the schoolhouse for such a purpose.

Among the Workers

THE report of the work of the Student Volunteer Movement for 1915 shows that during the academic year 1914-15 the secretaries visited 707 institutions, delivering 1,355 addresses and holding 9,452 personal conferences with students and faculty members. Twenty-nine student conferences were held during the year, attended by 3,471 students from 385 institutions. 15 878 men were enrolled in 1,161 mission study classes and 21,664 women were enrolled in 1,297 classes. Students and faculties of 682 institutions contributed $218,652.81 for missions at home and abroad, of which 62,061 students contributed $121,230.01. During the year 1914 278 and in 1915 329 student volunteers reached their fields of service under the various boards, making a total since 1886 of 6 190 volunteers who have been accepted by the boards.

TWENTY years ago a little company of Christians determined, by God's help, to send the Gospel to the neglected thousands living in the "regions beyond" churches and preachers, among the fastnesses of the Alleghany and Cumberland Mountains. At first only one evangelist, a faithful consecrated elder from New York, was sent forth, and $360 was provided for his salary. The work of faith has grown from year to year. Since the beginning in 1896, 262 missionaries have labored in these wild mountains. They made 51,000 visits, held over 22,016 public services at 10,069 places, had 6,304 confessions, distributed over 250 boxes and barrels of clothing among the poor, and over 10,000 Bibles and Testaments and 125,000 tracts; built 56 churches, schools and mission houses, including three colleges, a hospital, and an orphan asylum. The head of the Soul Winners' League is Dr. Edward O. Guerrant, Wilmore, Ky.

THE record for individual church registration was again broken at the Laymen's Missionary Movement Convention at Columbia, S C the First Presbyterian Church registering 207 delegates. Trinity Episcopal Church was second with 158 delegates. The Methodist churches of Memphis, Tenn., registered 61 per cent. of their men at the Memphis Convention. Immediately after the convention at Jackson, Miss., the Galloway Memorial Church received $1,000 in a special collection, the same collection last year having been $350.

THE Executive Committee in charge of the Five-Year Program of the Northern Baptist Convention met in New York on February 7. The secretary reported that the Five-Year Program had been presented at a Baptist rally in connection with each of the twenty-two Laymen's Missionary Conventions held prior to the holidays, and that there had been 5,669 Baptist delegates at these conventions; 250 churches had already been enrolled as cooperating churches, and it was expected that more than a thousand churches would enroll before the convention in Minneapolis. Rev. M. D. Eubank, M.D., of China has been called home for work as a special field representative in the Five-Year Program.

GOODYEAR
TIRES

A Preference Based on Tire Quality

Tire buyers' preference for Goodyear has now been reduced to definite figures by a tire census of 71 leading cities.

The result shows more than 21 per cent of the tires in these cities to be Goodyear.

There are 200 brands of tires on the market, all competing for business.

Were the country's tire business equally divided, every two hundredth car would be equipped with Goodyears — instead of which every fifth car is Goodyear tired.

Since dozens of brands undersell the Goodyear, you must attribute this preference to Goodyear quality and features of construction.

This quality—the highest there is in tires; and these features designed to prolong tire life and minimize trouble and expense —are cash-value advantages to the Goodyear user.

For he has found that they give him the lowest last cost, which is the real cost.

Goodyear Tires, Tubes and Accessories are easy to get from Goodyear Service Station Dealers everywhere.

Dependable Spark Plugs

THE official estimate of the AUTOMOBILE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE on automobile production this year is—

One million four hundred thousand cars.

Of these, over a million will be Fords, Overlands, Studebakers and Maxwells, equipped with Champion Dependable Spark Plugs.

The Manufacturers of over one hundred other cars will equip this year exclusively with Champions. Their production will exceed 120,000 cars.

So of all the automobiles produced this year it is apparent that more than four out of five will be dependably equipped —with Champions.

Champions have been selected by these hundred and more manufacturers because their exhaustive tests have shown that the Champions designed for their motors give the best results. Remember their conclusions when you replace the plugs in your car.

WISE HOSTESS

Won Her Guests to Postum.

"Three great coffee drinkers were my old school friend and her two daughters.

"They were always complaining and taking medicine. I determined to give them Postum instead of coffee when they visited me, so without saying anything to them about it, I made a big pot of Postum the first morning.

"Before the meal was half over, each one passed up her cup to be refilled, remarking how fine the 'coffee' was. The mother asked for a third cup and inquired as to the brand of coffee I used. I didn't answer her question just then, for I heard her say a while before that she didn't like Postum unless it was more than half coffee.

"After breakfast I told her that the 'coffee' she liked so well at breakfast was pure Postum, and the reason she liked it was because it was properly made.

"I have been brought up from a nervous, wretched invalid, to a fine condition of physical health by leaving off coffee and using Postum.

"I am doing all I can to help the world from coffee slavery to Postum freedom, and have earned the gratitude of many, many friends." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum comes in two forms:

Postum Cereal—the original form—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c pkgs.

Instant Postum—a soluble powder—dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

Both forms are equally delicious and cost about the same per cup.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

fiber, instead of lichens, the least flycatcher succeeds nearly as well in blending its nest with the limb on which it is situated.

Are the efforts of the Audubon Movement worth while? Let us study that question in the light of a few concrete examples of birds' value: 1,186 rose slugs, 75 to over 100 potato beetles, 1,500 mixed weed seeds, 5,000 weed seeds, 10,000 seeds of pigweed, are a few menus for a meal of a bobwhite. Professor Aughey found that twenty-nine of these birds had eaten 539 locusts, an average of twenty-five per bird per meal. Dr. Judd estimates that the bobwhites of Virginia and North Carolina consume 1,341 tons of weed seed annually. As a weed-seed destroyer, the mourning dove is in the same class, one of these birds having a record of 9,200 seeds for a single meal. Hairy caterpillars are the special delicacy of cuckoos and orioles, one cuckoo having been found to have gorged himself with 250 fall webworms. Even the tiny chickadee has a record as a gourmand for insect food. Four of these birds were found to have eaten 105 cankerworm moths. A careful count showed that twenty of these moths contained 3,703 eggs. The average per moth was 185, which would give a total of 19,425 eggs for the 105 moths eaten. Three of these birds had eaten a large number of eggs in addition. It has been estimated that a single chickadee will destroy 138,750 eggs of the cankerworm moth during the twenty-five-day season when the moths are active. So it goes throughout the bird world. Each has its favorite insect, or weed-seed, or mouse diet, and its own method of procuring the food. Nighthawks, whippoorwills, swallows and flycatchers take much of their food on the wing, in the shape of flying insects. Kingfishers dive head first for their finny prey (which, by the way, is mainly not the fish used as food by man), catching it in their powerful beaks, while fish-hawks strike the fish near the surface of the water with their talons, and herons, standing statuesque and quiet, use their long, sharp-pointed bills like spears. Woodpeckers probe the decayed wood for boring beetles and their larvæ, and sapsuckers tap the living trees like maple-sugar makers, both for the sap and the insects that are attracted to the feast.

Some birds confine themselves to a very limited diet; others are omnivorous. Crows eat grain and seed of various kinds; shellfish which they capture on the beach, and, carrying to a height, drop to break the shell; offal; insects of many kinds; eggs and young of small birds; field mice and other small rodents. The bulk of the food of warblers is insects, gathered on the ground, in the crevices of the bark, among the branches, twigs and leaves, and even caught on the wing; but the myrtle warbler, often remaining through the winter in northern states, where insect food is scarce, finds a substitute in bay berries, which contain a waxy substance with some of the properties of animal fat.

The highest office and most effective activity of the Audubon Movement is the educating of the people to an appreciation of the economic and esthetic value of birds as neighbors, and as such to cultivate, encourage and protect them, and increase their numbers, particularly about human habitations. In this connection it must always be borne in mind that predatory birds or other creatures do not threaten the existence of other species, for both are part of Nature's plan. Thus the hawk may take one of the song sparrows we have been fostering, but his presence will not seriously threaten the song sparrows of our neighborhood, because the hawk lives largely on mice, and mice destroy the song sparrow's eggs. With the European house sparrow or "English sparrow" and European starling in this country, it is a different matter, for man has introduced where Nature did not plant, and these birds in their new home have become a menace to native species. With cats it is a very different matter, for they are man's creatures, bred and kept under favorable conditions, removed from the battle that is imposed by Nature's balance, and preying on the wild creatures, which thus are under a heavy handicap. So we should remember that the pattern for an ideal bird sanctuary is the nearest possible approach to nature undisturbed—elimination of man's disturbing factors, but not of the predatory creatures in nature, which constitute indispensable links in Nature's endless chain.

As winter draws near to a close, and spring approaches, to be followed by summer, the birds in increasing numbers join with bees, butterflies, flowers and the endless objects that gladden the quickened eye of ever increasing numbers of people, and contribute infinitely to the material welfare of man. And in this gradual increase of bird forces, and particularly in the rapidly developing public spirit of appreciation and welcoming reception, we see the best and most valuable fruition of the Audubon Movement.

Gospel Notes

REV. F. G. HAMLEY, Baptist home missionary in northern Wisconsin, has sent to the Christian Herald an interesting report of his work in a wide circuit in the north woods. Mr. Hamley's work centers at Merrill, Wis., and he ministers to people speaking more than seventy tongues. Twenty-two miles east of Merrill, at the Cumming settlement, a small clearing in the great woods, he started a Sunday school in a log building. In the eastern part of the county, in a large Russian settlement, he found a household given to daily Bible reading and prayer, the members of the settlement having been converted by Baptist missionaries in Russia and having fled to America to avoid persecution. Farther to the north, about ten miles from the shore of Lake Superior, another audience waits the missionary in the cook shanty of a logging camp. In a saw-mill town thirty miles distant, Mr. Hamley has another flock. Last summer, in a seven days' missionary tour, the pastor traveled 300 miles, preaching nine sermons and making 100 calls, and making thirty-five of the 300 miles on foot.

THE MOODY BIBLE INSTITUTE of Chicago is already planning special summer work for school teachers, pastors, evangelists and theological students who have long vacations, and also for missionaries on furlough. The instruction will be entirely free and information will be sent on application. There are 996 students in the day and evening classes this term, 678 of whom are in residence.

HENRY WALLACE, editor of Wallace's Farmer, of Des Moines, Iowa, for many years a consistent good friend and able counselor of the boys and college men of Iowa, died on February 22 at Des Moines during the closing session of the convention of the Laymen's Missionary Movement. Mr. Wallace, though eighty years of age, was still active in good works and was chairman of the Convention Committee. He was a member of the Roosevelt Country Life Commission, and had done much during many years to change farming from a haphazard gamble to a proven science.

F. O. B. Detroit

Real economy in motor cars is vastly more than a mere matter of tire mileage and low gasoline consumption.

Practically any car of light, "flimsy" construction will make a creditable showing so far as its tires and carburetion are concerned.

But Repair Bills and Depreciation may tell quite a different story.

And these—after all is said and done—are the items which stamp your car as an economy or an extravagant luxury.

If you have seen the new Paige "Six-38" you can readily understand why the item of Depreciation on this car is bound to be a small one.

The "Six-38" is one year ahead of the field. It is refreshingly new in lines, design and equipment. It offers every convenience—every luxury—that a man or woman could possibly require.

And—like all Paige Cars—the "Six-38" is built to endure.

The price—complete—is $1050.

David Ferguson's Investment

AS David Ferguson turned the corner just beyond his home and quickened his pace toward the station, he was surprised to hear his name called and to find that he had been hailed by his neighbor, Watson, who was seldom seen afoot.

"Just having the car overhauled, Ferguson. Glad to have good company," was Watson's reply to Ferguson's greeting.

Ferguson waited until Watson came alongside, and the two men swung into a long stride. It was a midsummer morning after a thundershower, and the air was buoyant and refreshing.

"Just the morning for a good long run into the country, Ferguson," Watson remarked as he squared his shoulders and took a long breath. "How does it come that you've never had a car?"

"Never felt that I could quite afford it. For a number of years the payments on the home took my surplus, and since the mortgage was paid I've been investing in some good bonds."

"Well, as a bond dealer, I suppose I should commend your wisdom; but if I had those four hearty children I'd think pretty seriously about a car."

"I have thought about it a good many times and I mean to have one some day. Maybe I'll buy it when I can run it on the income from my bonds."

It was several weeks later that Ferguson again heard Watson hail him. This time they were just leaving the train from the city and Watson asked his neighbor to ride up with him, saying he had a proposition for him.

"You see, Ferguson, it's this way," Watson began as he slipped the engine into first speed and throttled her down; "wife and I are going out to the exposition next month. My son will be at college and my daughter will be busy with her teaching. There won't be anybody at home to run the car or to look after it while we are away. Now, you have a little garage on your lot. Bingham built it the year before you bought the place. If you'll take the car in and look after it I'll let you have the use of it while we are gone."

"But I don't know how to run a car."

"Oh, that's easy. We don't go for two weeks yet and I'll have the car home day after tomorrow. You and I can spend a few evenings together, and I'll guarantee that you will be able to get a license to operate the car by the time I am through with you."

Early in September Mr. Watson's car was run into Mr. Ferguson's little garage and the six Fergusons, for the fourteenth time in three days, compiled another complete schedule of trips for all the Saturday afternoons, holidays and evenings in the month.

DINNER that evening was a hurried meal—in fact, David Ferguson, Jr., was not seen to eat anything except his pie, and the family found him in the garage feeling of the tires, trying the crank, and peering under the hood. He announced that the carburetor was primed and he snapped on the battery spark the minute he saw his father leave the kitchen door. How did the boy learn to do it? His father had been going over in his mind, all day, the various details in the process of getting the car started, and he was both pleased and disturbed to find that he could begin the process at motion number three instead of one. He settled into the driver's seat and David Junior threw the engine over and climbed in beside his father but the car finally appeared at the curb, with David Junior at the wheel.

Mrs. Ferguson and the three younger Fergusons unanimously demanded of the young chauffeur an explanation of his unexpected skill.

The boy just smiled and looked as important as only fifteen years of elder brother can. He knew that interest in the mystery would not survive its clearing up; and he rather liked mystery, when he knew the answer.

The evening's ride was conducted under the joint pilotage of father and son, and the mysteriously acquired skill of the son gave the family a much larger use of the car than they had anticipated, one addition to the schedule being the elimination of David Ferguson's daily walks between his home and the station. Before the end of the month he began to look in a kindly way upon the poor fellows who had to walk, and, being a practical man, gave many of them lifts on their homeward way. In fact, he got a lot of pleasure out of these ministrations to weariness. Then, one day, as he was urging some of his neighbors to fill the car, he suddenly realized that he had just five days to use it before he must return to the pedestrianism of the carless. He found himself mentally comparing the five per cent. income on a couple of $500 bonds with the pleasure and wider outlook that had marked the last three weeks of the life of the Ferguson family. David was a very practical man, but he would no more decide for the interest than he would see rising before his mental vision some one of the tree-arched lanes or woodsy byways or smooth boulevards whose acquaintance he had made since the Watsons went away.

The Fergusons had planned for the last Saturday afternoon of the car's sojourn a picnic trip to a mountain lake which they had visited with the Watsons the year before. The life of the household during the intervening days was focused upon this trip, and David felt his grip on those bonds slipping as he sensed the hold which the car had taken upon the family. The day came, a perfect autumn day. A light frost had left the hillsides billowing waves of golden and scarlet and russet. A gentle breeze from the south and a cloudless sky and the temperature of early September gave a setting unparalleled for a picnic. The car ran smoothly and the only incident not in the schedule was a puncture which stopped the car on a curve of the road overlooking the lake, just a quarter of a mile short of the picnic ground they had chosen. While the two Davids were replacing the ruptured inner tube, the rest of the family discovered a new picnic ground more alluring than the other, so they camped where they were.

THEY rode home in the moonlight, a very happy, yet a very regretful, family, for the month was up. The Watsons were due home on the morrow. They were a bit surprised as they turned from the street into the driveway to hear Mr. Watson's voice hailing them. Their greeting mingled enthusiastic appreciation and lingering regret.

When the greeting was over, David Ferguson suggested that inasmuch as Mr. Watson was at home, the car might better be run into the Watson garage.

"Why not keep it here?" said Watson.

"It would be rather inconvenient for you, I am afraid," Ferguson replied.

"No, not at all. I ordered a new car before I left, and I find they will be able to deliver it tomorrow. The garage men can take the old car from here just as well as not."

David Ferguson's hold on those bonds was not only slipping, it was skidding, and skidding fast. Practical man that he was, he found himself unable to stem the current of his thoughts. Before he had willed to make the plunge he heard himself asking Mr. Watson how much the old car was paying toward the new and was not a little pleased that it was only $750. He had $350 in the bank and the interest date on his bonds was just two months ahead.

"Would you sell it to me for that?" he asked. "I could give you $250 and my note for sixty days." He could not bring himself to sacrifice that interest.

"Well, no, I couldn't, for the car is part of the deal and really belongs to Stewart; but I have no doubt Stewart will be glad to make the sale. Jump in and we'll run down there. He's always on hand late on Saturdays."

An hour later the two men ran the car into Ferguson's garage, and this time it was not Watson's car.

When April Comes

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

WHEN April trips along the road with violets in her hand, her smile is like a golden dream that brightens all the land. Her hair, unbound, floats on the breeze; her voice of tender mirth sweeps joyously across the fields, and wakes the sleeping earth. A rainbow glimmers in her smile, bright dewdrops crown her head, and at her touch the trees bud out that long have been as dead. She pauses by a frozen stream and melts it with the glow of love and youth and happy days; and hearts, that faltered slow, beat high again with life and hope. Ah! breathlessly we stand, and watch as April passes by with violets in her hand.

WHEN April trips along the road the children seem to know before the rest, for childish eyes are quick, and ours are slow. They sing to her with merry song and laughter light as [illegible] and lovingly they ask her in and bid her welcome home. And April, smiling, brings to them a wealth of treasure rare; she brings them pale anemones, and wild arbutus fair. She brings them sunlight warm and bright, and though she scatters rain, the children know that April's tears are not the tears of pain.

WHEN April trips along the road, the snow-wreaths melt away, and little creatures of the earth come out to frisk and play. The frog, the cricket and the toad, the butterfly and bee, are followers in April's train that every one may see. The robins come to build again in trees that live once more; the swallow sings beneath the eaves as he has sung of yore. A flash of orange cuts the air—an oriole sweeps by, for April brings a feathered flock of beauty to the eye.

WHEN April trips along the road with her misty eyes bent low, young lovers follow in her path, and care not where they go. Each breeze is but a [illegible] song, a song of youth and light; a song of Spring and smiling eyes, of day without a night. And April draws a gauzy veil about her dainty face, and trips demurely, wisely by with innocence and grace. But in her train [illegible] speaks to youth, and eyes smile into eyes, and loving hearts meet with hearts with wonder and surprise. And boys who never dreamed a dream are poets for a space, and poets swift forget their verse because some smiling face turned to theirs; and busy folk see bloom and gardens fair; and April laughs, and her laugh rings lightly on the air.

WHEN April trips along the road the farmer plants his seed, and April with a merry nod, sends rain to [illegible] his need. She knows that hungry folk will bless the bread his wheat will be, and April bids her sun to shine, for April's gold is free. She knows that the warmer months will see the crops that grow; she knows that harvest will not be her joy, but, even so, she knows that she has started well, that her witching sky will send the rain to make plants live, and sun to keep them dry.

WHEN April trips along the road, she hums a little tune—a plaintive bit of melody, the promise sweet that June swells into song; and yet it holds an echo of the time when winter froze the world in ice. Her song is like the chime of sleighbells gay, and wedding bells, and bells that toll for death. For April hums a changeful tune—wistful, beneath her breath. For sometimes when the loudest songs that crash and roar and shout, the songs that do not whisper thoughts, but tell their message out, are swept away, the plaintive songs, the tunes with wistful theme, creep out and nestle in your heart with brightest, clearest gleam.

WHEN April trips along the road, the mother sits and sews, on dainty flower-sprinkled frocks, and boyish linen clothes. And as she sews her eyes are bright with visions of the day when little folk will wear the frocks in joyous childish play. Each tiny stocking that she darns, each bit of lace she sews, each dainty hand-embroidered cuff is sweet as early rose with fragrant thoughts and mother-love, with blessings and with joy! And April sighs and envies them, the human girl and boy.

WHEN April trips along the road and twilight settles down, she passes lightly through the mist of springtime gray and brown. And as she goes along her way the stars peep out and glow, the moon smiles down with merry smile, a gleaming silver bow. And old folk, sitting in the dusk, lift up their weary eyes, and look along the springtime road with unconcealed surprise. And, half uncertain, half surprised, they hear the song of love, the song of youth and happiness, the songs from Heaven above. And half bewildered, half amazed, they know that through the land a train of lovers softly walk together, hand in hand. They know that farmers plant their crops, that mothers sit and sew; that robins build again their nests; that music, gentle, slow, is singing on the breeze of night; they know that flowers spring upon the brown of well-loved graves; that moss and ivy cling with tender arms about the earth that guards each sleeping form; they know that resurrection comes and banishes the storm.

WHEN April trips along the road with violets in her hand, her smile is like a golden dream that brightens all the land. Her hair, unbound, floats on the breeze, her voice of tender mirth sweeps joyously across the fields and wakes the sleeping earth. And we, who in the winter time have fought with ice and snow, and battled with the chilling blast, we gently smile, and know that God above is very good to send his blessing down—his blessing as an April maid with dew drops for a crown. Ah! at her touch the trees bud out that long have been as dead; she walks the earth and flowers grow in white and gold and red. She pauses by a frozen stream and melts it with the glow of youth and love and happy days; and hearts that faltered slow beat high again with life and hope. Ah! prayerfully we stand and watch as April passes by with violets in her hand.

The Oat-Fed

And the Indolent

The Effect of Spirit-Giving Food

Oats are for the active, the alert.

They are fed to spirited animals, not to the placid.

They are for workers, not for loafers.

You who seek vim and vivacity—who would "feel your oats"—should make this a daily dish. For oat flakes are 75 per cent. latent energy.

It's the morning dish, because the day calls for activity. It's the man's dish if he works. It's the children's dish, because young folks are vast energy consumers.

A now-and-then dish cannot reveal oats' animating power. But a daily dish will do it, and to everyone's delight. Try it for 30 days.

Quaker Oats

Just the Dainty Flakes

If you think oats desirable, make them inviting. The way to do that is to serve Quaker Oats only.

Quaker Oats are made from the queen grains. We get but ten pounds from a bushel. These big, plump grains—just the cream of the oats—rolled into large, luscious flakes.

That's the reason for this extra flavor. It makes the dish doubly delicious.

Millions of oat lovers over the seas send to us to get it. Yet it costs you no extra price.

It is a pity, we argue, to serve food like this in less than its finest form.

Quaker Cooker

Send us five trademarks—the picture of the Quaker—cut from the fronts of five Quaker Oats packages. Send $1 with them, and we will mail you a large, heavy double cooker made of pure aluminum. It is made to our order to cook the flakes perfectly. We want every user to have one.

1/3 More Heat, 1/3 Less Fuel

Smoke, gas and soot contain half the heat value of coal; but in ordinary furnaces they are worse than wasted.

In the "XXth Century" Furnace, the air chamber forces an abundant supply of air through cells in the wall of Firepot and all around inside of it, causing an intense flame, and converting every particle of fuel and gas into heat. Burn slack coal, coke or anthracite. Save money by using cheaper grades of fuel, and less of it; get heat instead of smoke and dirt—and have a warmer, cleaner home.

Peter and Cornelius

International Sunday School Lesson for April 16. A s 10: 1-23; also Acts 10: 24-48

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"There is no distinction between Jew and Greek; for the same Lord is Lord of all, ar is rich unto all that call upon him." Rom. 10 : 12.

This call is to the Lord! "Lord Jesus" is an invocation which carries adoration with it. To adopt the phrasing of the previous verse, we must confess with our mouth the Lord Jesus, and when that confession is made we immediately find ourselves the recipients of the wealth of his saving help. When we believe in our heart in the risen Saviour, we stand before God accepted in his righteousness, but when we confess that he is our Lord and Master, and prostrate ourselves before him in lowly consecration, we begin to experience what it is to share in his unsearchable riches. It is incredible to those who do not know our Lord, how much he will do for those who love and obey. e seems to say to them: "Thou art ever h me and all that I have is thine." He m es all grace abound toward them. T rs are the precious things of heaven an of earth, and the good will of him that d lt in the bush. It is our Lord's good plea re to give. In tiny arrangements for ur comfort, in the selection of our fri s, in the provision of rest and chang n grace to forgive and restore, he seen o excel even his promises. The only li ts are those imposed on him by our lac of faith and expectancy. He is rich o all and therefore unto you, so take d give.

A Vision and a Visit

By Arthur H. Howland

SUPPOSE just for the sake of emphasizing what did happen we tell the story of what did not happen. Suppose, instead of the story we have in the tenth chapter of Acts, we had this story:

Cornelius, a pious captain in the Roman army, stationed at Cæsarea, had a vision directing him to send to Joppa to ask a man named Simon Peter to come and tell him some spiritual truths.

He said: "Oh, no. That will not be worth while. This man is only a Jew, while I am a Roman. Anyhow, I don't take any stock in dreams. My friends will think I have gone crazy if I do a thing like that. I'll just go on trying to pray as I have been praying."

Or suppose this had been the story:

Cornelius, a pious captain in the Roman army, stationed at Cæsarea, had a vision directing him to send to Joppa to ask a man named Simon Peter to come and tell him some spiritual truths.

At the same time Simon Peter himself was resting in the home of his friend Simon, at Joppa, and had a vision in which a great cloth containing all sorts of animals was let down from heaven and a voice said: "Rise, Peter, slay and eat." Peter said: "No. Nothing common or unclean has ever entered my mouth." But the voice said: "What God has cleansed, that call not thou common or unclean." This happened three times.

Just then the servants of Cornelius arrived and asked Peter to go with them. He refused, saying: "No, I can not go. I am a Jew, and according to all Jewish traditions it would be wicked for me to go to your master's house to be his guest. I am sorry, but I can not come."

He suddenly recollected the vision he had seen and it occurred to him that perhaps the vision was a message from God telling him to break away from the past and venture out into new paths, trusting not an ancient tradition but a living Guide to show him new ways of helping new people.

But he said to himself: "No. It was only a dream. The old laws are surer than new fancies."

And he said again to the men: "I can not go. The boundary lines between the Jewish race and other peoples must be kept distinct and inviolate. Thank your master for me for his kind invitation, but tell him my conscience forbids me to come."

KEEPING in mind these stories of what might so easily have happened but did not, think now of the wonder of what did actually happen.

A hard-headed Roman captain did send to a distant city and ask an unknown man of another race to come to his house and show him the truth. This man in his turn had a dream calling him to break away from the traditions of his people, to do what his conscience forbade, to go out along a new road, walking by a new rule, to bring new happiness to new people.

It is impossible to overemphasize how much was at stake. The Jewish religion under the old dispensation could confine itself to the Jewish race. To be sure, many Jews were zealous proselytizers, persuading the people of other laws to become circumcised and submit themselves to the law of Moses. But this was not a very general movement among the Jews, and must have been carried on under grea difficulties, because of the ceremon and Rabbinical restrictions on inte ourse with other nations. There was positive prohibition in the Old Tes nent forbidding a Jew merely to vi the house of a Gentile, but with the inteous ideas of oriental courtesy was almost impossible to do this hout being asked to eat, and that of ourse the Jew could not do in a G tile's house. But the whole spirit their tradition would tend to make t Jew shun any social intercourse wit Gentiles. This was the reputation th had among other peoples who d not understand their motives for t exclusiveness.

But now something had con into Judaism that could not be kep back by these iron bands of restrict . A mass of dough unleavened lie quiet in the pan; but a bit of ye will make it seethe and swell and ru over. An acorn dropped in a crack of giant rock will become a sapling, a the sapling will burst the rock. A g wing tree will burst an iron ring. the experience that came to the b evers at Pentecost made an outburst nevitable. The narrow limits of J aism could not contain the glory and s ndor and power of the Pentecostal b sing. It must be offered to all the orld.

Not all the apostles and ot believers felt this. The hold of t past was too strong upon them. Pe was first thrust out on this extensi program. Then Paul, who had r eived his Pentecost later than the rest oldly took up the mission to the Gen es as his special task. We are to s dy a few weeks later Paul's turning the Gentiles. But Peter made thi noble beginning when he went from th ouse of Simon the tanner at Joppa the house of Captain Cornelius at C area.

It meant that hereafter God's eople were to be controlled not by la but by love. It meant that the plai f life was not to be by the prohibit ns of law, but by the promptings ward helpfulness. It meant that n law but life was to be dominant. It eant that not one nation is to be sav , but every nation. It meant that m not only of the same race, but men c every race, are brothers.

I REMEMBER a scene yea ago which reminded me then a reminds me now of Peter's visit Cornelius. A group of friends were iting in a pleasant home on a pleasa summer evening for another friend w was to bring us a new message about new blessing. Special services ha been held in a grove near a neighborin own. A minister of the town had cau t the new spirit, understood the new ssage and entered into a new exp ence. HE RISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York, N. Y.

rea for your pupils on your class map, so that the towns may seem more real. Both are seacoast towns, Joppa about forty, Cæsarea about seventy, miles from Jerusalem. Cæsarea was the summer capital for Palestine. At the great palace there built by Herod the Great, Pontius Pilate had lived, and later Felix and Festus.

Distinguish this town from Cæsarea Philippi, farther inland, which Jesus visited just before the Transfiguration.

Can we imagine what it must have been like to hear Simon Peter preach? There have been preachers and evangelists in recent times who had such power that even while they spoke, before invitation had been given to come to altar or inquiry room, the wills of the people had been melted down, making way for the coming of the Holy Ghost. Mr. Moody loved to tell about Peter's familiarity with Jesus. One of his great sermons described beautifully how Peter took Paul around the city of Jerusalem during Paul's first visit there, showing him the places where he had walked and talked with Jesus. So Peter now, while he is telling Cornelius about this matchless Friend, puts his statement so graphically, so forcefully, that this Roman officer and his friends really get a vision of Jesus, and the Holy Ghost comes flooding their hearts.

Would it not be possible for us, even yet, to know Jesus so intimately and love him so much that as we talked with others about him their hearts would be thrilled and melted?

This was all the proof Peter needed that he had done right to come to Cornelius's house. Good had come of it. People had been blessed; souls had found God. Anything is permissible and justified that gets people acquainted with God and makes them love him.

This narrative has been divided into two parts by the International Committee, one for this week, one for next, to be used as an alternate with the Easter lesson. But Easter should be devoted to the Easter narrative, and the story of Cornelius and Peter can well be studied in a single lesson.

Missionaries in Mexico

AFTER eighteen months' absence from Mexico, Miss Wheeler and Mr. Gregory, Presbyterian missionaries, have returned to Saltillo. Of conditions in Mexico Mr. Gregory writes: "We found a hearty welcome among the brethren and they were glad that we were again in their midst. Cheap money has brought Mexico to a serious economic crisis. The prices of foodstuffs have increased to alarming proportions. I suppose Zitacuaro is about as cheap a place to live in as any in Mexico, yet here, during the last few weeks, lard has increased fifty cents on the pound; sugar 75 cents on the pound; manta, the cloth of the poor, $1 on the yard; corn $20 on the cargo, and beans $30. A common day laborer has to work about ten days in order to buy enough manta for a shirt, a day to buy a small piece of soap, etc. If the economic problem cannot be solved within the next six months we may look for a very serious situation. Under such conditions the entire country suffers, because everywhere you look one sees that things are out of joint and very abnormal. But the religious forces in Mexico may well feel optimistic and expect great things."

Rev. J. T. Molloy writes "Mexico is ablaze with fine opportunities for preaching the Gospel. I only wish we had fifty more missionaries and at least 500 more native workers. The Lord is moving the hearts of the Mexican people in this day of golden opportunity."

Another missionary writes: "The rate of exchange fluctuates as the wind. Some days it is 18 and some 20. Some days it is 17 and some 22. It would take a Philadelphia lawyer to find out why. But the poor country! Its money basis seems to be a printing press, for it is all paper. Poor Mexico! Intrigues, plots, concessions, rebellions, revolutions, diseases, and I fear the next trouble will be sharks—land sharks, mine sharks, lumber sharks, money sharks, hemp sharks, until there will not be anything left."

Many Help the Prisoners' Gospel F

THE European War Prisoners' Gospel Fund is finding friends everywhere. Letters continue to be received from many states, showing how widespread is the interest in the effort that is being made through the Fund to proclaim the Gospel to the prisoners in the great camps in Europe. All of the writers are in cordial sympathy with the movement, viewing it as a great opportunity for practical spiritual service.

I. W. S., St. Anns, Ont., Canada, writes: "After reading 'The New Call to Service' in the Christian Herald, it appealed to me to do something for this cause, so I now enclose $5 to help carry on the work, with the prayer that it may be blessed for good."

"I am enclosing a New York draft for the War Prisoners' Gospel Fund amounting to $12," writes Ella W. E., Gainesville, Fla. "This is part of my 'tenth' money of my salary saved up for several months. I will be glad to keep in touch with this work through the columns of the Christian Herald."

Mrs. R. J. S., of Pittsburg, Pa., sends $5 and writes: "This is a thank-offering for a yet unanswered prayer, but to which I expect an answer in the near future. I believe as you do that this is an exceptional opportunity for missionary work, and hope the response will be prompt and strong."

"I believe this to be a very good cause," writes Mrs. A. A. C., Thornhurst, Pa. ($1). "One of my neighbors gives me the Christian Herald to read and in it I saw 'A New Call to Service.'"

"I desire to have a hand in the War Prisoners' Gospel Fund," writes S. S. B., Newport, Ore., who sends 50 cents. "I am now over eighty-two years, and my income is limited, or I would give more."

G. J. T., Alderson, W. Va., writes: "Enclosed find my check for $5 for the purchase of Bibles or Testaments for the Russian prisoners in Germany or Austria, with my prayer that you may in some way reach them with the Bread of Life."

"I am glad you have opened your paper for subscriptions to the War Prisoners' Gospel Fund in Europe," writes L. F., Cleveland, Ohio ($2). "I wish my gift could be two thousand! The poor soldiers are to be pitied—they and their suffering families. May God bless them." E. M. S., Alton, Ill. ($1), writes: "I pray God may so bless this small amount that some may be led to believe on Jesus Christ to the salvation of their souls." Mrs. O. D. T., Xenia, Ohio, sends $1 and adds: "May God see fit to hasten the day when the world will again be at peace. This fearful slaughter makes us all sick at heart."

"This goes with a prayer to the Father of all nations who call upon his name, in the faith that his rich blessing may attend it, and that the yearning hearts of the stricken ones may be filled with the love which cannot be taken away from them," is the hope expressed by Mrs. H. E., Batavia, Ia. ($2). S. E. H., Portville, N. Y., sends $5 and writes: "I am sending it to be used for Gospel work among war prisoners, and with it goes my prayer that God will bless this work to the evangelizing of Russia." "I am so glad to contribute my mite to send them the Gospel," writes Mrs. S. M. B., Passaic, N. J. ($2). "How much they need the comfort and help that the Gospel affords and which none but Jesus our Saviour can give! May many turn to righteousness is the prayer of your old-time friend."

Mrs. E. N. and Miss E. N., of Madrid, Ia., send $2 and add in their united letter: "May a rich and bountiful harvest of souls be won to Christ." Mr. and Mrs. O. J. R., Ashland, Ore., send $1, with the prayer that "God will bless the gift, though small, to the good of some soul who needs Christ." These are samples of many such letters that are reaching us daily, showing how deeply the appeal has touched the hearts of God's people.

mor is. This advantage consisted in he pture of the town and bridgehead of cieszko on the Dniester River. The nportance of this capture is in the act hat it puts it in the power of the Ru ans to cross the Dniester River o ove southeastward to attack Cze owitz and Bukowina. It is highly rolble that this campaign will be usl d, not only for its own importance, ut so for its possible moral effect, if uc sful, on Rumania, whose frontier s or a few miles from the scene.

A 'ERIOD of what may be called emi-calm, in contrast to the in- ens activity of the preceding days, har terized the Verdun battle of last atl lay and Sunday, March 18 and 9. arly in the morning of Sunday, the ren launched an attack on the ern n positions on the eastward slope f l Mort Homme hill, but the Ger- an stopped the onslaught with artil- ry efore it had time to make any ppr iable progress. After this, in- ant fighting there ceased, though for om me the artillery kept up their uel

T flanking movement by the ern ns to the west of Verdun con- inu Tuesday, and gained considerable rou l to the southeast of Malancourt nd e wood of the same name, by apt ing Avocourt wood. Later on the ren reported that hill No. 304, and the village of Esnes, were subjected to a heavy bombardment, which would seem to indicate that an infantry attack may be shortly expected in this region.

The German position to the west of the Meuse was again improved on Wednesday afternoon by their securing a foothold on the hill of Haucourt, to the south of Malancourt. Though small in itself, this gain coupled with the gains of the preceding days in the region to the west of the Meuse, is of considerable importance. Still further to the west the German line moved forward slightly along its entire length, and at the nearest point is not more than about four miles from the Verdun-Clermont railroad.

Thursday no infantry attacks occurred on any portion of the front. The artillery, however, was very busy, particularly on the west front, where the Germans bombarded heavily the villages of Malancourt and Bethincourt and Cumieres, which are all three nearly surrounded, the German lines now enveloping Cumieres in a semi-circle of wider radius.

It will be probably a day or two before the Germans attempt any serious advance movement, the interval being used presumably for bringing up their heavy artillery near the line won at the last advance. When the next attack is made it will probably be from the German cables, on hill No. 304 on the front west of the Meuse.

rot ol and at last reports it had been ent Carranza for his signature, which, he given, will put the protocol into ll ee and effect.

On March 21 Villa was reported to ave een defeated at Namiquipa, and b flying toward Cruces. General ers ng was reported to have sent fly g column toward Cruces in an for to head him off. Considerable isq tude was expressed on the 21st nd 2d by the failure of communica- on etween the border posts and Gen- al rshing.

Ge ral Pershing was heard from on e ernoon of March 22, but his dis- atc s were reported to cover merely out matters and told nothing as to e s cess or progress of the expedition. arr za appears to desire to cooper e lly with the American govern- en but his ability to hold his fol- we in line, especially those in the ort rn part of Mexico who were rm ly adherents of Villa, is becoming il a more open question. On the 2d e of Carranza's leading sup- rte, General Luis Herrera, a former illi who was deposed on the 20th ilitary governor of the state of hi hua, was reported to have re- ur d Carranza, and to have an- ur d himself in favor of Villa, and h formally declared himself at war ith he United States. General Herrera as ported to have taken with him s rrison of 2,000 Mexican troops ho ere fully equipped and well sup- ied ith American munitions. These oo were part of the organizations o which the tightening of the net ou Villa depended. The report of erra's defection was later denied fic ly but there is no evidence of the e his troops against the bandit- tla. It began to appear probable on e d that the trap which on the th ad appeared to be closing about illa might have become a haven for m, d that it might even become a trap r eral Pershing and his 4,000 men. The are about 25,000 American ldi s now on the border, and about 000 nore available within the United at The American troops have un the provisioning of General ers g's column a difficult matter, d ery day emphasizes the necessity r t use of the railroads.

Th latest news, March 27, was a port from General Pershing that illa instead of being defeated at am uipa, had himself defeated the arr za troops and was heading ro h the foothills of the Sierra Madres into the Guerrero district, in which his capture will be exceedingly difficult. American troops were not yet reported as having caught up with Villa or his band or as having taken part in any fighting, although they had penetrated about 230 miles into Mexico.

General Pershing's latest dispatch as the Christian Herald goes to press, stated that the Carranza forces were cooperating with the American forces, but he was none too sanguine about the immediate capture of Villa. The difficulties of the transportation service are increasing with the length of the line. More automobile trucks have been purchased, and the army is anxiously waiting permission to use the Mexican railways. Carranza was reported on March 26 to have approved the protocol, suggesting some slight modifications, and it was expected that all questions between the two governments would be satisfactorily arranged early in the week.

A squadron of eight army aeroplanes is accompanying General Pershing's expedition, making their base at Casas Grandes. On the flight south, two of the machines experienced trouble, one of them not being found for three days. Conditions for reconnaissance have been unfavorable, and the aviators have been unable to do any effective work, but much is expected of this arm of the service in scouting for stray groups of bandits.

Reports from General Funston showed that the reported strengthening of the Carranza garrisons along the border was not born out by the facts, and on March 26 the President issued a warning against unscrupulous influences which were inspiring Mexican rumors with intent to cause intervention. The President said: "It is my duty to warn the people of the United States that there are persons all along the border who are actively engaged in originating and giving as wide currency as they can to rumors of the most sensational and disturbing sort, which are wholly unjustified by the facts. The object of this traffic in falsehood is obvious. It is to create intolerable friction between the Government of the United States and the de facto Government of Mexico for the purpose of bringing about intervention in the interest of certain American owners of Mexican properties. This object cannot be attained so long as sane and honorable men are in control of this Government, but very serious conditions may be created, unnecessary bloodshed may result, and the relations between the two republics may be very much embarrassed."

Good News for Farm Women

A wonderful new separator has been invented that will make your work a great deal easier. The old-style separator has always insisted on being turned at regulation speed, whether you were well or ill, rested or tired.

A slight slowing of speed in turning the handle meant a loss of cream—and money. One's attention had to be strictly on turning the crank at an unvarying high speed which was trying to both mind and strength.

But, this new Suction-feed Separator meets your moods. Its speed is your speed, and yet it skims absolutely clean at all times.

THE NEW SHARPLES SUCTION-FEED

Separator draws up into the bowl just the right quantity of milk—always in exact proportion to the separating force. If you feel out of sorts, you may turn slowly; if you feel spry, turn as fast as you please and the bowl will take up more milk. Fast or slow, the cream will be of the same thickness.

The knee-high supply can does away with the hard, high lift no woman should be asked to endure day after day. The Sharples bowl has only three pieces to clean, not one heavy, bulky, or fussy—and no discs. And, there are many other exclusive features.

Drop us a postal and we will send you our new book, "Velvet" for Dairymen. It tells all about the Suction-feed Separator and explains our liberal free trial offer. Write at once to Dept. H.

Get To-day's Message Out of the Bible!

Bible truths were not applicable only to the people and events of Bible times; we all know that. The thing is actually to apply the Bible to your own life and to current happenings

TO BRING YOU A NEW REALIZATION OF THIS FACT IS ONE OF THE AIMS OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BIBLE PICTURE CONTEST

Those of our readers who have been following the succession of scenes presented in the Bible Picture Contest pictures must have observed that while many illustrations portrayed an approximate likeness of ancient costume, landscape, architecture and history, there have recently been included in the series a number of drawings showing a general scene or a modern scene. Why not? We venture to assert that you cannot find one section of actual life or a picture out of any gallery or publication for which a diligent search will not reveal an appropriate Bible verse.

That is why we are publishing in the series a few pictures of modern scenes. We want to vary the Contest series. We want you to reale anew, in fitting Bible texts to these scenes, tht the eternal truths of the Bible are intended r today.

We urge every one who has not yet begun o start at once to secure the back pictures (they e given free with the Outfit) and make the Contst your pastime and companion during your evenis and your spare moments at any time. Clip t pictures 46, 47 and 48 from this page and we ll send you the back pictures free with the Out. Then clip out the balance of the sixty pictures s they appear, three each week. You have pley of time to compete.

Equal Opportunity

There are no "winning" answers for you to "guess." At the end of the Contest an impartial committee of judges will be handed a list of all the different Bible verses submitted for each picture, and this committee, absolutely unprompted, will designate the best, according to the rules.

Everybody is on an equal footing, for the simple reason that no answers can be sent in until the entire sixty pictures have appeared, and you do not have to submit your set until some two months after the appearance of the last picture! The first set submitted will be given no preference over the last set submitted—the sets will be judged wholly on their merits under the rules.

A swers to Bible Contest Inquiries

Q stion: I do not understand from the rule whether one is expected to have say two or re complete sets of verses for all of the 60 ures in the contest, or does it count just as ch or more (when you see a picture that you e just positive fits a certain Bible verse) if y just put one verse (first choice) for that pict e? Then perhaps you see another picture hat three verses would fit, one verse alm as well as another, and you just put dow three sets for it, or first choice, second cho and third choice. I have tried to make plai what I mean. Must there be complete sets r can one have one verse for some picture hey are certain about and two or more for ers? That is, I mean, would it count not hat way to put two verses (or a first and secc choice) to a verse you were sure that the st verse was right?—E. W., Connersville nd.

A wer: You are confusing a "set" of ans s with the answers themselves. A con tant may make as many as five answers ver) for each picture, and he may submit thre lifferent sets of answers—that is, three diff nt lists of answers. Thus a contestant may y submitting five verses for each pic- ure submit, in three different sets, fifteen vers for each of the pictures.

Y may submit one verse for picture No. , th e verses for No. 2, five for No. 3, one for No. and so on. In other words, you can subr from one to five verses for each picture ust as you please. If you find one vers that in your opinion fits a picture so well at there can be no question about it bein the best verse, then you will probably subr only that one verse for that picture. If you d five verses for another picture, that y r opinion fit the picture more or less well d any one of which might be designated the st verse for the picture, then you will prob ly submit all five verses for that picture And if you want to submit more than ve rses for a picture, or for several of the pict s, or all of them, then you can submit se d set of verses, in which you will make the ditional answers.

T rewards will be awarded primarily poi he number of best verses submitted for the tures, and that's why it is considered goo olicy by many participants to submit ive verses for a picture—if the verses all fit the picture pretty well. Then if the Judg select one verse as best for the picture, inst of the one you thought the best, well, perh s you will have their choice down too, and us you will be credited with the best vers or that picture. The relative position i wch you write down your verses for a pict will not count except in the event of tie See the Rules, clause 6.

Q stion: In "Gems from the Bible," page l, quotation from Gen. 43:28 has the word 'abeisance'' wrong, I think I never saw e word begun with an a, but always with o

O page 37, the quotation from Judg : Samson is spelled Sahson. I don't n o spell those words wrong, and I don't n o do anything that would lessen my ar s to get one of the rewards. If I spell en right will it count against me?—C. T. , owe, Vt.

A ver: We are sorry to say that a few n aphical errors crept into our "Gems n he Bible."

Y can write the verses down just as you d em in "Gems from the Bible," or write en correctly, as they are spelled in the ut ized (King James) Version of the Bible, m an edition. That is the final authority t Contest. But anyone submitting a rs s it is given in "Gems from the Bible" ill, course, be given credit for its correct rm So you can't go wrong. Generally ea ng, it is best to follow the "Gems," d sure; but in the case of a word spelled co ctly of course you may want to submit e rd properly spelled. Either way you ll right, but be sure you follow the ver- on entioned above. Our Red Letter Bible o of the editions mentioned, so if you pp to have that you can be sure.

Q tion: In looking through my Reply o. I noticed that only one prize would be nt any one address. Although I am living th Miss S. at the present time, I am not a en r of the family and will have no idea ha heir answers will be.—R. B., Cleveland, hic

A wer: You may compete independently th Bible Picture Contest, and win a reward our own, even though the other people t house also win. Our rule regarding mi participation refers only to members of e nily at one address. Unrelated people in at one address may each win a wa .

Q tion: If my question is one that can a vered without violating one of the rules th Contest, please answer. Is the light ow in picture number twenty-two (22) from do, or window, or is it a supernatural ht The picture does not show clearly het r the scene is outside or inside a building.—Mrs. H., Milledgeville, Ga.

A ver: It is a long-established rule of e ristian Herald to answer freely and frankly all questions directed to it, but our Bible Picture Contest has imposed one exception upon that rule—we find that we cannot discuss the pictures with one contestant, and not discuss them with all. If we gave a contestant some special information concerning a picture, upon a point that you did not query us about, then that contestant might have an advantage over you by reason of the knowledge given her, and might win a reward which otherwise you would have won. You can see that this applies to all pictures and to all our readers and well-wishers.

In general we would say that in considering a picture you should not center your attention upon a minor detail, but seek to apply to the picture the verse which fits it best as a whole, as expressing the scene and action the picture shows. Put yourself in the place of the Judges who will designate the best answers, and say to yourself: "Which verses, taking it all in all, really fit the pictures the best; which verses express the scenes most completely?"

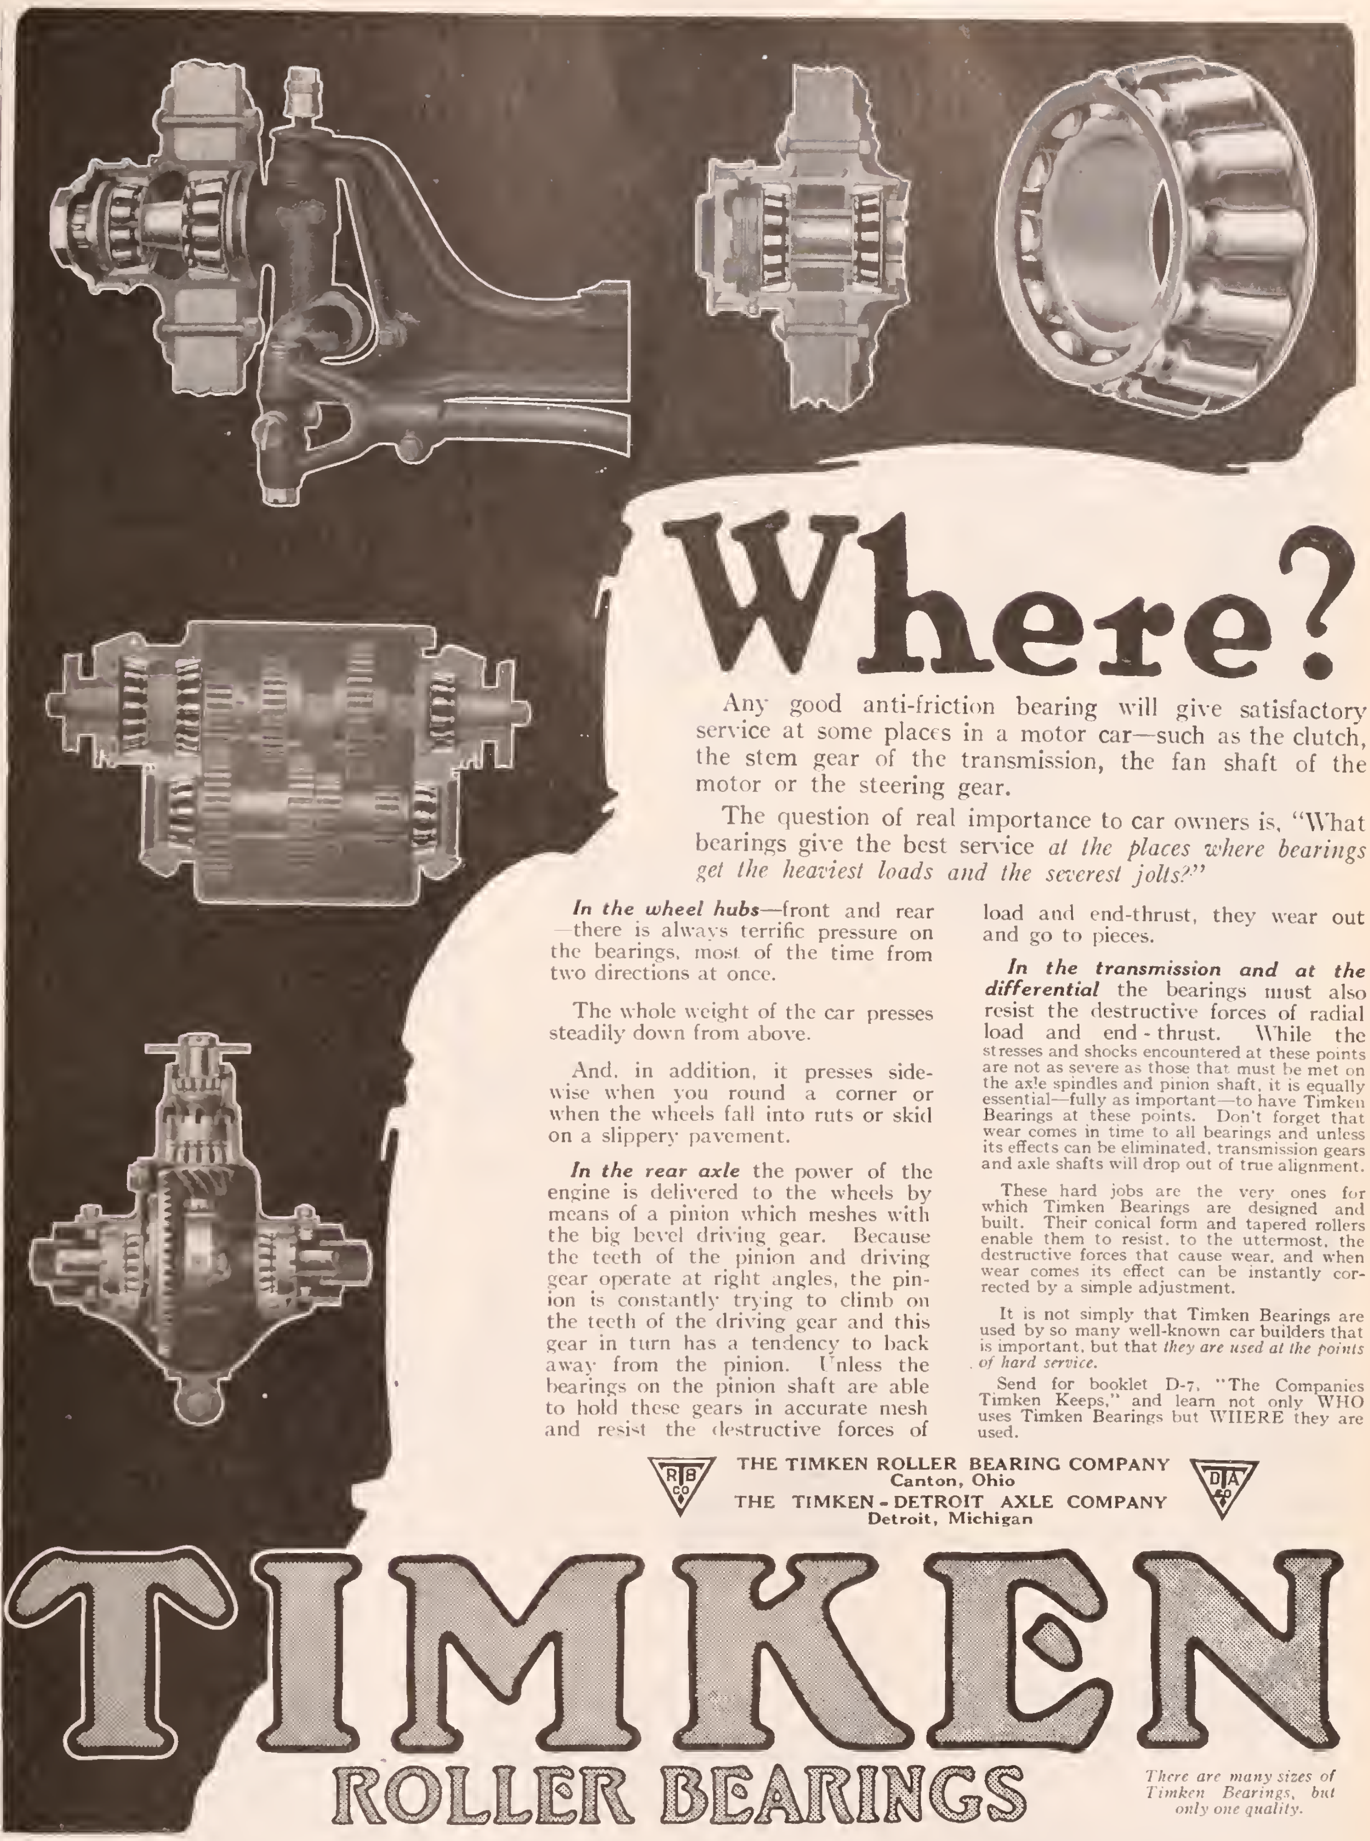
Question: (1) If a person should send in only one answer (Bible verse) to each of the sixty pictures, and the answers were all correct, while another person should send the same answers as first choice, but with two, three, four and five answers to each of the sixty pictures, which set of answers would win the first prize, the set which contained only one answer to each picture, or the set which contained the largest number of answers?

(2) Which one of these sets would win first prize, viz: Only one answer to each picture and only 50 of them correct, another set with 200 or more answers with 60 correct answers? Would the set of answers of 200 with the 60 correct answers and the 140 incorrect answers win over the 60 answers with 50 of them correct?—F. A. D., Blue Mountain, Miss.

Answer: (1.) If one contestant (A) submits one verse for each picture, and each verse is a best verse, and if another contestant (B) submits several verses for each picture, giving, however, all the sixty best verses as first choice, then (A) will take precedence over (B), because he made the smallest number of incorrect answers. In fact in this hypothetical case, A would submit no incorrect answers at all. But in answering this question we feel we might not do our full duty to stop here. We wish to point out that the Judges may name more than sixty best verses for the sixty pictures, for one thing; there may be pictures for which the Judges will not be able to agree upon only one verse as best. They may very probably say that two or more verses are equally "best" for this or that picture. So a contestant, submitting only one verse for a picture, in case the Judges name more than sixty best verses, could not possibly submit all the best verses. Suppose the Judges named 70 best verses?

2. If X submitted a set of one answer to each picture and 50 of his answers proved best ones; and Y submitted a set of 200 answers, 60 of which proved best, then Y would take precedence over X, for he would have submitted the greatest number of best answers. Primarily the rewards will go to those who submit the greatest number of best answers. It is only where there is an equality in the number of best answers submitted (as in the case of A and B above) that other considerations will enter. So if Y had only 51 answers prove best he would win over X, because he would have submitted the greater number of best answers.

There are folks who are mean enough to kill the spirit of a revival and then criticize it for being dead.



Where?

Any good anti-friction bearing will give satisfactory service at some places in a motor car—such as the clutch, the stem gear of the transmission, the fan shaft of the motor or the steering gear.

The question of real importance to car owners is, "What bearings give the best service at the places where bearings get the heaviest loads and the severest jolts?"

In the wheel hubs—front and rear—there is always terrific pressure on the bearings, most of the time from two directions at once.

The whole weight of the car presses steadily down from above.

And, in addition, it presses sidewise when you round a corner or when the wheels fall into ruts or skid on a slippery pavement.

In the rear axle the power of the engine is delivered to the wheels by means of a pinion which meshes with the big bevel driving gear. Because the teeth of the pinion and driving gear operate at right angles, the pinion is constantly trying to climb on the teeth of the driving gear and this gear in turn has a tendency to back away from the pinion. Unless the bearings on the pinion shaft are able to hold these gears in accurate mesh and resist the destructive forces of load and end-thrust, they wear out and go to pieces.

In the transmission and at the differential the bearings must also resist the destructive forces of radial load and end-thrust. While the stresses and shocks encountered at these points are not as severe as those that must be met on the axle spindles and pinion shaft, it is equally essential—fully as important—to have Timken Bearings at these points. Don't forget that wear comes in time to all bearings and unless its effects can be eliminated, transmission gears and axle shafts will drop out of true alignment.

These hard jobs are the very ones for which Timken Bearings are designed and built. Their conical form and tapered rollers enable them to resist, to the uttermost, the destructive forces that cause wear, and when wear comes its effect can be instantly corrected by a simple adjustment.

It is not simply that Timken Bearings are used by so many well-known car builders that is important, but that they are used at the points of hard service.

Send for booklet D-7, "The Companies Timken Keeps," and learn not only WHO uses Timken Bearings but WHERE they are used.

Buy Your Tires at Factory Prices

YOU can buy Buckskin Tires from us at prices which are "the lowest in America" for a tire guaranteed for 4000 miles. This is a positive fact. And here is the reason:

We have no branches, no salesmen, no dealers. By shipping direct to the man who owns a car, we have reduced our selling expense to a minimum. And we have devised other methods of keeping down overhead charges. All our money goes into making a thoroughly good black tread tire—dependable to the last mile.

Let us tell you about our attractive offer direct to auto owners.

BUCKSKIN
PLAIN & NON-SKID
Guaranteed TIRES

Buckskin Tires are absolutely good tires in every way, shape and form. Nothing but the purest Para rubber and the strongest Sea Island cotton fabric are used in their manufacture. Every tire and tube is rigidly inspected before leaving the factory. We are selling Buckskins now to hundreds who bought Buckskins last year.

OUR GUARANTEE—Every Buckskin—patented basket-weave non-skid, or plain tread—is guaranteed for 4000 miles. If you don't get this mileage—and a majority of Buckskin users invariably get much more—a credit in full will be allowed for the unexpired mileage and we'll pay expressage both ways.

The Christian Herald Prayer Leagu

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League. All correspondents are specially requested to make their letters as brief as possible. Write requests and acknowledgments on separate sheets.

W. E. HALES, of Pikeville, N. C., writes: "I beg to advise that prayers for my brother-in-law have been answered, and that he is healed of lockjaw, about which I telegraphed you on February 3; I wish to thank the Prayer League for their intercession in his behalf."

A letter comes from Mrs. W. B. U., of Wytheville, Va.: "I praise God our prayers for my husband have been answered. He was saved last night. I praise God for all his goodness to us. Now we are on the heavenly way together. We are also having a great revival here. Many souls have been saved, besides my dear loved one. I am also better of the nervousness. Let us pray more earnestly for the other requests."

Mrs. A. P. writes from Creston, Iowa: "I want to write to the Prayer League acknowledging answer to prayer. Some time ago I wrote asking prayer for a revival in our little church at Spaulding, Iowa. We held a three weeks' revival and had a splendid meeting, with thirty-seven converts, and there were many young married men and women united with the church with their families of little children, thus establishing so many Christian homes. I get much good out of the Prayer League in reading the answers to prayer. I firmly believe the results of our meeting were through the united and earnest prayers of the good Christian people of the Christian Herald Family."

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have also been received from:

Mrs. W. T., Ontario, N. Y.; Mrs. M. B. S., York, Pa. (for her son); Mrs. E. McG., Salem, Ore. (for improved hearing); Mrs. M. R. W., Winchester, Va.; M. E. KING

EIGHT CYLINDER

A "Demonstration" on paper which every King dealer can make a fact. The five great essentials of performance and design reach superlative degrees in this big powerful successor to our pioneer Eight.

FLEXIBILITY—INSTANT "GET-AWAY"

With seven passengers can be throttled down on "high" to two miles per hour. At this "creep" one can walk alongside, raise hood and examine engine. Small bore long stroke cylinders with extra large valve ratio, combined with a perfectly balanced crank-shaft and fly-wheel, explain this extraordinary performance. A touch upon the accelerator and the car is away at a racing speed.

ACCELERATION HIGH SPEED

From two to sixty miles an hour without gear-changing, vibration, or noise. We believe the King gathers speed with greater rapidity than any other car on the market and all accelerometer tests support this opinion. Eight cylinders, aluminum pistons and large valves help make this possible. Engine gives nearly 3000 R. P. M.

HILL CLIMBING ON "HIGH"

An unperfected experimental car of this model ascended the famous three-mile twisting hill of Uniontown, Pa., on "high" with six passengers, average weight 176 lbs. Slowed down to five miles per hour and accelerated to thirty-five on steepest part of grade. With two passengers made these three miles in four minutes and forty-one seconds with full touring equipment. Starting from Denver in "high" climbed Lookout Mountain and Genesee Peak, Colorado, without once shifting gears or slipping clutch.

EASE OF OPERATION—COMFORT

The ideal car for women who drive because of little gear shifting—and that little made easy. The driving seat is placed for maximum comfort in the operation of brakes, gear lever and steering wheel. The front axle is "raked" to make wheels normally roll straight even on one side of the road's crown. Long Cantilever springs of King design give all-day trips an "easy-chair" comfort.

A New Moslem World

By REV. SAMUEL M. ZWEMER, D.D., F.R.G.S., of Arabia and Egypt

If one could stand on the top of the minaret of the great Azhar University Mosque and look eastward, westward, northward and southward over what is termed the Moslem world, and then remember its past history of thirteen centuries, nothing would so impress the houghtful observer as the vast changes which hav taken place within the areas of these lands which for ll these centuries have been dominantly Moslem. Lea ing out of account the spread of Islam in Africa and its extension in some parts of Asia, especially India and Malaysia, the map of the old Moslem world rema s about the same. Islam was cradled in the Wes t, and has for all these centuries dominated No h Africa and the Near East, together with Persia and Central Asia. In 907 A.D. the bounds of the Cal hate included the whole of Turkestan, Persia, and Western India, and stretched from the confines of e Chinese Empire to farthest Morocco and inlud d the whole of Spain. Well might the ruler of o v st a domain call himself Suliman the Magnificent.

T day the distribution of political power has uterl changed. Even before the present war the ur ish Caliphate included only thirteen millions ut f the two hundred million Moslem world populat n. Great Britain's rule extended over ninetyve million Moslems, the Queen of Holland had under er protection thirty-five millions, while in Russia he were nineteen millions, and in the French colnie nearly sixteen million enjoyed the protection f this Christian power. With the exception of Afha stan and Persia, both of which may now be on lered buffer states, there are no independent Mo em rulers in the world. Where formerly doors er closed and the hope of even driving the plowshare nto virgin soil was deferred by manifold obstacles, ow these doors are nailed open, and three-fourths f t e Moslem world may be said to be accessible to he colporteur, the preacher, the medical missionary nd the teacher. Everywhere there is seed-sowing; i ny places there are signs of a coming harvest!

The whole of Africa with its forty-five million Mo ms has passed under Christian rule or proteco and the responsibility of the European powers or he Dark Continent is more and more being reaed by them. A recent map published in the Geoca ical Journal showed the network of railways re ly built or under construction in the Dark Contien a vast system of highways for the Gospel. Where r rly fire and sword played havoc in the great ud n we now see a well-administered province of the rit h Empire, and over the very desert where Kitchne troops pushed their arduous way to the capital, we have express trains with sleeping and dining cars carrying travelers in four days from Alexandria to Khartum.

"If one could stand on the top of Azhar"

Perhaps there is no nation to which God has given larger responsibility as regards the white man's burden than Great Britain. She holds the highways and gateways of the Moslem world as no other nation. All the way from Gibraltar, the Straits, the Canal, at Suez, Bombay, and Calcutta, every great metropolis of the Mohammedan world save Constantinople is already under the power of Great Britain. All the strong and colonizing Moslem races are British subjects. This responsibility is measured also in the terms of dynamics: "To whom much is given, from them shall much be required." God has given this responsibility to a nation which has the Gospel, to a nation which has missionary traditions, which has the love of exploration and of a difficult task. As goes England after the war, so will go Russia, France, and Holland in their Mohammedan policy.

It is true that the war with all its horrors well-nigh succeeded in plunging portions of Africa and Asia into another horror of a jehad against Christians. The Armenian massacres and the tragic effects of the war throughout the Near East, with the exception of Egypt, cannot be forgotten; but we may thank God that he restrained the remainder of wrath. The time is not yet come when we can prophesy of the future, but we may surely expect the final disintegration of Moslem political power as one of the results of the war; and it is well-nigh certain that not only in Europe but in the Near East, "after the earthquake and the fire, there will be the still, small voice" of God. Observers in many fields had already noted a changing attitude before the war on the part of many toward the Gospel. And whatever deep feeling there may be of nationalism or of sympathy with the Allies or their enemies, there is a deeper unrest spiritually in the hearts of multitudes. The work of evangelization has gone on almost unhindered in such fields as Algiers, Egypt, and especially India.

ONE of the workers in Algiers writes: "The work around us among the Moslems of Algeria seems to reflect in a measure the long, patient underground 'stand' of the trench warfare of Europe—here and there a few yards gained; here and there a few lost—hardly visible to the onlooker. Aggressive effort suffers for want of men workers, and from war conditions with their curtailment of traveling facilities. Some of the converts have been scattered or discouraged. But there is a spirit of listening abroad, and a sense

The group of mission buildings at Bahrein, East Arabia, calls attention to the coming occupation of the interior by Christian workers

The walled city of Medina, Arabia, 240 miles north of Mecca, and second only to that city in sanctity to the Mohammedans that the hidden sap is stirring, even through wintry days, for a spring time that is coming; and the God of Hope is with us."

In Egypt all the missions are encouraged with an increasing number of inquiries, and some Moslems of the better class are boldly taking a stand for Christ. In the Theological Seminary at Cairo a class of evangelists is preparing for special work, while in the Delta and along the Nile the American Mission has a Gospel car and two river boats constantly in service. Never was there so much and such variety of good literature for Moslem readers prepared and distributed as is being produced today from the various mission presses, especially the Nile Mission Press in Cairo and the Christian Literature Society in India. These books and tracts find their way to every part of the Moslem world, and are translated into a score of languages. From Cairo alone 34,504 books and booklets were distributed in the past five months—nearly all among Moslems.

The accompanying illustration of mission buildings at Bahrein. East Arabia, calls attention to the fact that the Arabian Mission has gained a firm foothold not only, but is definitely planning for the occupation of the interior, where Turkish authority no longer exists, since their expulsion from Hassa.

There is a changed attitude throughout the Moslem world also on the part of the educated classes as regards their own religion. Where formerly their line of defense was the traditions and their method of attack the statements of the Koran, they have now chosen for their arena in the fight for truth the Old and the New Testaments. A Moslem in India wrote a commentary on the book of Genesis. In Cairo they have reprinted whole portions of chapters from the New Testament as a proof that all Christians should be Unitarians! More Moslem pupils are attending the mission schools than ever before.

NOT only has there been preparation, but there is expectation among Mohammedans. Not only has there been this plowing, but we are beginning to see the signs of harvest. "Say ye not that there are yet four months, and then cometh the harvest? Behold, I say unto you, lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest."

There was a day when Mohammedan fathers and mothers would rather see their children die in their arms than carried to the hospital of the Christian. Today every hospital from Morocco to Aden is crowded. There was a time when they would not send their children to any Christian school in Arabia, in Persia, or even in Egypt; when the number of Moslem pupils was numbered by ones and twos; when in some Mohammedan lands we had almost to pay them to come and receive instruction. T lay the Cairo College of the American Mission ha 150 Mohammedan girls, who pay the highest fees re-ceive a Chrstian education. Calcutta, Bo ay, all India, could tell a similar story. The are crowding the educational institutions of the is-sionaries.

And the Bible! The Bible is the best-selling ok next to the Koran in the Mohammedan world. en thousand copies of the Word of God were sold the Persian Gulf last year.

The whole situation is a call to prayer and se ce. We can win a spiritual victory only by spi ual forces. We need a new host of missionary volu ers and a new outpouring of liberal gifts to meet th ew situation. If we would have them love Jesus C ist, we must love him more than our dearest posses ns. The Moslem problem is after all chiefly a spi ual one. We can sum it up in that hymn we so ten sing: "Thou, O Christ, art all they want, more an all in thee they'll find." Only the reign of sus Christ can produce true economic changes, and ue from poverty the Moslem world. Only Jesus C ist can satisfy manhood and its proper desires fo rue nationalism in Morocco, Algeria, Egypt, and lia, among Mohammedans. Only Jesus Christ ca re-deem Moslem womanhood and help Mohamn lan childhood.

Military Training in Schools

By LUCIA AMES MEAD

IN view of the widespread discussion upon military training in our schools, the following testimony is of great value:

The Special Commission on Military Education and Reserve appointed in 1915 by the last governor of Massachusetts reports:

> The overwhelming weight of opinion from school teachers, military experts, officers of both the regular army and militia, and the general public is against military drill in the sense of training with a musket, manual of arms and close-order formation. It is generally agreed that the military drill which a boy receives is of little or no advantage to him from the point of view of actual soldiering. As far as available evidence goes, drill in the schools has no beneficial effect in promoting enlistments in the militia except in a few isolated localities. For various reasons it has seemed to create a dislike for soldiering. It is worth noting that military drill as such is given in the schools of no countries in the world except Australia and Japan. The commission does not recommend military drill in the schools, but is opposed to it. It does recommend the greater development of physical training in the schools and inspection of such training by some central authority.

The National Education Association has recently strongly protested against military training in the schools. Six military officers who were selected by the Boston School Board to report on the value of military training, which has been used for fifty years in Boston, advised that military drill be reduced to a minimum, and that military calisthenics, first aid to the injured, woodcraft, scouting, knot-tying, sanitation, etc., be studied. Target shooting should be optional.

The much vaunted "Wyoming System" proves to have only 300 students in the whole state which practice it. In Laramie it has failed and been discontinued.

Nathan C. Schaeffer, superintendent of public instruction in Pennsylvania, has just sent a circular letter to superintendents and teachers throughout the state calling attention to the Senate Bill introduced by Senator Chamberlain in Congress, which requires all youths between twelve and twenty-three to submit to military drill, under penalties ranging from $25 to $500, and imprisonment; exceptions being made to members of certain religious societies.

Superintendent Schaeffer, after calling attention to the thousands of boys who have been thrown into prison in Australia and New Zealand because of refusing to drill, says:

> After 1871, France introduced military training into her schools. More than two decades ago this was dropped and the uniforms and other expensive accoutrements were sold at auction. That this was not a mistake is evident from the account which the French soldiers are giving of themselves in the trenches. Germany has relied on gymnastic drills and other exercises to develop the strength and endurance which the soldier needs. Dr. Angerstein, a high authority in army circles, pronounces it "a physiological crime to introduce military drill into the schools." Gymnastic drills and other exercises are employed to counteract the one-sided physical development which drill with guns produces.

The recent testimony of Dr. Dudley A. Sargent is that "the most military nations in the world do not have military drill in their schools." Dr. Charles W. Eliot, in discussing the supposed value of military training in developing the habit of implicit obedience, says:

> This habit is the worst habit a boy can acquire after he ceases to be an infant, because it implies the subjection of the boy's own will. The soldier's discipline, as it has been understood in the despotic governments of the Orient and Europe today, begins with the breaking of will, the subjection of every man to his superior officer, instinctively—on the spot. That is not a good way to train republicans. What we want in the form of discipline in the army is just what we want in industries: it is cooperative work; it is the sense of comradeship. The military discipline that has come down to us is something quite different and very inferior for the purpose of educating and training effective human beings . . .

We may well ask what virtue there is in obedience so far as education of the will is concerned, if a man knows that he will be court-martialed and perhaps shot if he disobeys. The evidence that military training does not develop tha elf-mastery which is the goal of all e ca-tion, is the fact that disbanded so ery are rather less temperate, chaste nd law-abiding as a usual thing than ose who have never been to war or li in barracks. As Kipling says: " gle men in barracks don't grow into p ter saints."

The most dangerous feature c the demand for military training is tha t is based on a new fear and suspicion ich is infecting the minds of all yout nd is planting the seeds of a future ld-war. Imagination and not reas is appealed to. "I have just got m ew uniform," writes a boy in a Co rd, N. H., school which has adopted mi ary training, "and I feel as if I coul kill anything."

The present demand for mi ary training of college students implie at our navy is bound to prove a failur nd can not prevent invasion; that ich mines and submarines as have re-vented Germany from invading ng-land, 300 miles distant, and have re-vented the greatest navy in the rld from bombarding German forts, ca not be employed by our navy with ual success, in the event of a Europe or Oriental invasion, which Dr. Elio ell declares to be a danger that is "a os infinitesimal." Our real enemies a all within, and at present we are u rly unprepared to fight them.

The Easter Alleluias

*A SERMON BY PASTOR W. H. T. DAU

TEXT—I Cor. 15 : 14. "If Christ be not risen"

THIS is, without exaggeration, the most momentous "if" in the Bible. There was an "if" concealed in the serpent's query in Eden—that fatal question which veiled a sneer: "Yea, hath God said?" Hell rang with wicked laughter when the question had been negatived by that first disobedience and the fall. If God had not said what man believed him to have said, there was no transgression of his holy command in carrying out the tempter's suggestion. Alas! the doubt that was then instilled in the hearts of our first ancestors wrecked the fortunes of our race.

With a threefold "if" the wily deceiver approached the second Adam in the desert: "If thou be the Son of God." "If thou wilt worship me." "If thou be the Son of God." Satan was at his old tricks again, but this time he met his master. The Gospels do not relate that the demons advanced this doubt a second time. On the contrary, they fled dismayed at the exorcising power of Christ's word and confessed him "the Holy One." Angels had been watching that strange interview in the fastnesses of Judea between their Lord and their apostate brother. Once more, eternal issues hung upon the answer to those "ifs." They witnessed the tempter's defeat and the triumph of Jesus. They bowed before the lowly Christ in grateful adoration and joy over his victory. A man, though in the form of God and equal with God, had beaten the spirit of doubt, and they hastened to minister to his human needs.

"O my Father, if it be possible!" It is the night of the betrayal, and the speaker is the Man of Sorrows. He has stooped in supplication amid the olive groves of Gethsemane and is trembling at the cup that is handed him. There is that "if" again! True, it comes with a greatly weakened force. The possibility to which it refers is very, very remote. The speaker, as it were, doubts his own doubt. But the "if" is there. It perplexes our poor intellect, which fain would reach down into the abyss of the humiliation of the Son of God that is opened up to us in that agonized prayer in the garden. We would like to understand how this thing can be: that he who is very God of very God seems unable to comprehend the painful duties which his mission includes. That "if" touched the sinners' ransom. Without that cup, the salvation of mankind could not have been accomplished. A truly human being spoke that "if," but asserted in the same moment his superior power over all that was human in him, by declaring, "Nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt." The God-man conquered in that hour of terror.

HE finished his work the next day. He rose, victor over sin and death, on the third day. His disciples believed on him. They went forth into all the earth with the message of his victory and proclaimed that faith which, even in their day, overcame the world. But the greatest among them—who yet regarded himself as the least—was confronted in his ministry with an "if" that threatened to annihilate Christianity. He met men who denied the resurrection of the dead and, by implication, the resurrection of Christ. At a glance the apostle saw the awful conclusions to which that denial must inevitably lead. "If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain. Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God; because we have testified of God that he raised up Christ: whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not. For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised: and if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." The denial of the resurrection of the Lord, in the apostle's estimation, signifies the crisis for our religion. It has signified that in every age in which the denial has been attempted. Everything falls when the truth of the resurrection of our Lord falls.

Our preaching is vain. We preach Christ crucified—the Christ who had said, "No man taketh my life from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again." "Destroy this temple"—meaning his body—"and in three days I will raise it up." In view of such sublime assertions, a dead Christ could not escape the stigma of a self-deluded enthusiast, or worse still, a conscious impostor, a false prophet. As such the synagogue had pretended to regard him, and that is what they tried to prove him by preparing, with every contrivance known to them, against his fraudulent resurrection. Their logic was correct, and mercilessly keen. If Christ failed to rise, we have a "deceiver" as the author of our religion, and all who preach Christ are false witnesses, though they declare themselves servants of God.

DISPROVE the resurrection of Christ, and our faith is vain. The two central facts of the saving faith of Christians are: the remission of sins—for Christ's sake, and our own future resurrection unto life—for Christ's sake. We believe in the Christ that "loved us and gave himself for us." We view his crucifixion as the greatest spectacle of self-sacrificing love that this world has seen. For why was he crucified? "Surely he hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows: yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted. But he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and with his stripes we are healed." "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them." "Christ his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree." The blessed vision which the Gospel sets before the despairing sinner is the vision of "the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world." Nothing but this can still the voice of the accuser in our bosom. But mark you! this picture is incomplete without the resurrection. "Christ was delivered for our offenses, and raised again for our justification." A dead man could not bring our aching heart the pardon from the just Judge which it craves. The most charitable view that we could take of Christ's death in that case would be, that it was the useless squandering of a good life.

We believe in the Christ who said, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God: and they that hear shall live"; who said to Martha, challenging her faith in his words, "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die"; yea, who actually linked our resurrection as an effect with his own as the cause, when he said, "Because I live ye shall also live"; "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish." Assurances such as these have been the solace of many a weary pilgrim in the hour of his departure. They have turned death into a sleep and made dying easy. The prospect of that great day when immortal life shall issue forth in glorified form from the abodes of corruption has caused Christians to welcome death as a messenger from the Prince of Life. But if Jesus remained in the clutch of the king of terrors, a pall that is never lifted settles on "that lively hope" which the Bible has nursed into a strong yearning in us for the great God and Saviour Jesus Christ. If he did not return from his martyrdom, it is folly to hope for his second appearing. His dying claim, "It is finished!" would have to be read, "I am finished," and the gloom of despair would become the shroud of his dying disciples

IN that remarkable piece of fiction, "When It Was Dark," Guy Thorne has strikingly set forth the consequences that would have followed Jesus' failure to rise. Paul's "if" is not a hypothesis to be debated as an academic diversion. In every age, the elements hostile to Christianity have directed their strongest attacks against the resurrection of Christ. This is still the most hotly contested point in the Apostles' Creed. In our day, science has leveled its deadliest weapons against this point. First, the genuineness of the records of Christ's resurrection was assailed. This attack failed: the records could not be proven spurious. Next, the reality of Jesus' death was questioned. It was not death but syncope, we were told. People thought Jesus dead, but he had only swooned and afterward revived, when the nervous tension to which he had been subjected during his trial was relaxed in the stillness of his tomb in the garden, and when he breathed the aroma of the strong spices that had been applied to his body. But this theory broke wn when its advocates were asked to explain the ar- thrust of the soldier which must have passed th gh the pericardium; the omission of the usual cr ragium—that is, the breaking of the bones—in th ase of Jesus, while it was applied to his compani in death; the report of the guard to Pilate; the s ing of the tomb by the Synagogue, and the witn of the friends who prepared the corpse of Chri for burial.

When the reality of the death of Christ had be admitted, an attack was next made on the real of his appearing on Easter Day and later. Frenc nd German scientists advanced the "vision-theory, nd with the aid of much-labored psychology stro to prove that the disciples had not really seen the sen Christ but imagined they had, owing to their ong mental excitement. They had so fervently hop for his return that their frenzied imagination pro ed spectral apparitions which they took for the sen Lord. But this theory too had to succumb t the force of the facts cited against it. In the first ce, the hope of the disciples, which the theory pi res with the utmost exaggeration, is an assumption. he disciples were rather a despairing, crestfallen nd; the death of Christ had put out their hope, as Cl as declared. Moreover, Christ appeared many time not only to individuals but to several persons at a ne; yea, at one time to a great gathering of his foll rs. Among these some were not disposed to accep the report of his resurrection at all, as witness Pete nd John at the grave, and Thomas. Christ appea in different localities, many miles distant from ch other, and his disciples had to travel a long way f the last great appearing of their Lord. While the r rds of Christ's resurrection remain authentic, ever attempt to explain away the fact of the resurr ion itself is doomed to failure.

AND now the message of the Easter angels, " e is risen; he is not here; behold the place where ey laid him!" starts in the hearts of believers a grea nd holy joy. All "ifs" disappear; every doubt is ssipated. The faith of Christians rests, not on a th, not on a pious wish, not on an artfully contrived f d. but on the solid basis of God's truth. The E ter Alleluias that are ringing through the wide rld breathe the grateful adoration of souls who say t one another:

> How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord,
> Is laid for your faith in his excellent Word!

The sinner is sure that the ransom has been aid for his guilt, and has been accepted as valid nd adequate. He is emboldened, with Paul, to cha nge the whole world: "If God be for us, who c be against us? He that spared not his own Son, b delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with hi lso freely give us all things? Who shall lay any thi to the charge of God's elect? It is God that just th. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that ed. yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the ght hand of God, who also maketh intercession f us. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? all tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or fami or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Nay, in all these t ngs we are more than conquerors through him that ed us. For I am persuaded that neither death, no fe, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor t ngs present, nor things to come, nor height, nor d th, nor any other creature, shall be able to separa us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesu our Lord."

Now let death come: through the yawning ave the dying believer looks straight into Paradise nd says with his last breath:

"I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he all stand at the latter day upon the earth: and t gh after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my sh shall I see God: whom I shall see for myself, and ne eyes shall behold."

> I am content! Lord, draw me but to thee,
> That from the dead I rise
> With thee, my Head, and enter cheerfully
> Into thy heavenly joys.
> The fetters of my body sever,
> Then shall my soul rejoice forever.
> I am content.

Daily Meditation

Sorrow's Children

SUNDAY, April 16. Rom. 5 : 3, 4. "Tribulation worketh patience, and patience . . ." The apostle Paul sees everything at work. Nothing is inert or passive. Nothing is idle or stagnant. "All things work together." And the dark things in Christian experiences are working just as much as the bright things, for they are all under divine control, and are coerced to gracious issues. "Tribulation worketh," and under such divine carefulness as to produce the radiant spirit of hope. Last summer I saw black peat on the island of Arran. It was black as midnight, and thick, and close, and sodden. And then I looked at some of the dainty things which were finding sustenance in this midnight bog, and waving their fair banners in the moorland air. There was the blue forget-me-not, and the graceful heather-bell! The black peat worketh the moorland flowers! "Tribulation worketh patience!" Do not let us look so much at the peat that we ignore the flowers.

Let me name one or two of the children of sorrow. There is love, with all her bright attendants. Who has not known love born in the night? And who has not known love born again in the night? Perhaps it was our love for God which in the garish day had drooped and died, and in the black night it rose again from the dead. Or perhaps it was our love in the family, or our love for our friends. We had grown careless, and our love had degenerated into indifference; and then the night fell on our soul, and the withered affection revived. Or perhaps the child of the darkness was a nobler, purer, and more sacrificial love for our native land. It was in the night of exile that Israel found a loftier, more passionate love for Jerusalem. "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, may my right hand forget her cunning!" That was a flower of the peat.

And Wisdom is one of the children of Sorrow. Strange light is born in the night. "We never saw it until the sorrow came!" Our cleverness is supplanted by simplicity. In the darkness the eye becomes single, the sight becomes simple, and the whole body is full of light. "Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now . . . !"

And it is in tribulation that we gain our noblest conquest of ourselves. Before the trouble came our powers were like disbanded troops. But night gathered our troops together. The black night restored unanimity to our souls. It gave us our sovereignty and our crown. J. H. J.

The Bitter Mingled with the Sweet

MONDAY, April 17. Ex. 15: 22-26 and Matt. 26: 36-46. "The Lord shewed him a tree." We all know something of this wilderness march. How great is the difference between the rapture of emancipation from some crushing trial and the wearing tax of monotonous plodding forward! The start is both interesting and delightful; but it is hard to plod on day after day, amid the glare of temptation, the grit of tiny annoyances, the routine of irksome toils. And then these Marahs will come in the form of bitter disappointments. Our ideals shattered, our cherished plans defeated, the water we had hastened to obtain too nauseous to swallow! Were it not better to go forward with no vision of coming relief, than to be buoyed up with a false hope, which proves to be an unsubstantial mirage? What pilgrim to the City of God has not visited these springs, and mingled bitter tears with their bitter waters?

Beside each Marah pool a tree grows, which, when cast into the waters, makes them palatable. Poison and antidote, infection and cure, pain and medicine are always close together. The word which saves is nigh thee, in thy mouth and heart. And of what is that tree the type, if not of the cross of Jesus, which is the symbol, not only of our redemption, but of a yielded will? Our Lord nailed his own choice to the cross, when he said, "Not my will, but thine, be done." There is nothing that will so soon extract the bitterness from disappointment as to look into the Father's face and say: "I will take the cup that thou hast mixed for me, and will call upon thy name."

The Way to Peace

TUESDAY, April 18. Isa. 66: 12. "I will extend peace to her like a river, and the glory of the nations like an overflowing stream." This word is the culminating prophecy of the enlarging of Zion's kingdom, as pictured in the last chapter of Isaiah. Amid all the vicissitudes and external changes, the fundamental fact of the children of God is that they are borne on from beneath by the deep flow of God's love and power, which is likened to the steady undeviating stream of a river, whose central current is always flowing on toward the sea.

Our lives are like a branch cast upon the surface of a great river. A wind from the mountains ruffles the surface and blows the branch hither and thither. The sun shines upon it, when the river seems to be nothing but a polished mirror; the tempest rolls down upon it, and the branch seems lost in the lashing of the waves. Yet underneath, the stream is steady, and always moving according to its own law toward the ocean. As long as we keep conscious of this fact, the sunshine and the storm become as incidents only in our settled belief of the outcome. We can know through it all that the deep current is the one thing to be trusted, and we are going with it to its sure goal.

The main thing is to keep our small life-boat in the main current; our daily work, our courage and our service should be our special care; the moving power beneath us is the river. We need only to watch our steering; the motive power that bears us along is God. Accepting this, reminding ourselves of it in daily meditation makes this river "a stream of inward peace; broadening as we grow older, first enriching our own souls, and then pouring itself forth to bless other lives." C. S. C.

The Name Above Every Name

WEDNESDAY, April 19. Isa. 65: 1-12. "I said, Behold me, behold me, unto a nation that was not called by my name." Gentiles are designated here. To us is this appeal made. Paul's own reference to this chapter in Rom. 10: 20 enables us to apply it to ourselves. The Master says, "Behold me." What extraordinary contrasts meet in him! Pilate was indeed justified when he cried almost involuntarily, "Ecce Homo!" "Behold the Man!" He was the Prince of sufferers. Behold and see if there was ever sorrow like unto his sorrow! Yet so far from being degraded by his suffering, he absolutely transfigured it, so that the cross has become the sign of victory. Lifted on the tree, Jesus says, "Behold, behold me!" He made great claims. He said that he was the Son of the Highest, and could come in clouds with his holy angels. If any other should make such claims, he would be rightly classed with the knave or the fool; but our Lord has established his claim. He reigneth at the right hand of God, and from the throne he says, "Look unto me and be lightened, that your faces be not ashamed! Behold, behold me." Though he saved others, he would not save himself. The crowds gathered to see him die could not understand how this could be. They had witnessed such mighty works proceeding from his word and touch, that the impotence of his cross staggered them. He was crucified in weakness. But though he was crucified in weakness, he liveth through the power of God, and to all who are weak with him, he cries, "Behold, behold me!" He was misrepresented and maligned, but his detractors were silenced, and God has vindicated him by giving him the Name that is above every name, and to those against whom all manner of evil things are being said falsely and for his Name's sake, he says, "Behold, behold me!" F. B. M.

The God of All Comfort

THURSDAY, April 20. Isa. 66: 13. "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." Paul, in writing to the Corinthians, takes up the strain running through the prophecy of Isaiah, saying, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies and God of all comfort; who comforteth us in all of our afflictions, that we may be able to comfort them that are in any affliction, through the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God."

As a child goes to his mother for comfort and for a certain kind of heart-understanding which his father seems unable to give, so the prophet pictures God with a heart and the feeling of a mother for his earthly children, sharing intimately with them their sorrows and partaking eagerly with them in their joys. God, whose name is "Love," seems throughout the Bible to understand that there are certain experiences of the human heart too intimate and too sacred to be exposed even to the merest personal earthly friend. As only the earthly mother can hear with understanding sympathy certain confessions from her child, so Isaiah has pictured God as a loving refuge, into which human hearts may pour out their entire troubles without fear.

If this word should chance to come to one laden with sorrow or overcome with deep despair, let him recall the word of Jehovah: "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." C. S. C.

The Heavenly Manna that Feeds the Soul

FRIDAY, April 21. Ex. 16 : 11-21. (See John 6 : 47-51.) The gift of manna is full of holy instruction. We must look up for supplies. "He gave them bread from heaven to eat." For the believer there are five sources from which help may come. In addition to the four quarters of the winds he looks up to heaven. There came from heaven the sound as of a mighty wind. Look higher, child of God, to Jesus as he sits at the right hand of power! We must feed on the heavenly bread daily and early. Israel had to gather the manna before the sun waxed hot.

There is no time like the early morning for feeding on Christ by communion with him and pondering his words. Once lose that, and the charm is broken by the intrusion of many things, though they may be both useful and necessary. How different is that day from all others, the early prime of which is surrendered to fellowship with Jesus! Nor can we live today on the thoughts of yesterday. It must be daily bread.

We must obtain from Christ our strength and comfort. If only believers in him would realize and appropriate the lessons so clearly taught in this narrative, they would find themselves the subjects of a marvelous transformation. It is almost incredible how great a difference is made by the prolonged study of what Scripture has to say of our Lord. Food cannot repair unless it is assimilated. We must digest food, if it is to nourish. We must absorb Christ. Change your diet from that which is not bread, and feed on the living Bread of eternal life, Christ. F. B. M.

The Glorious Promise of Immortality

SATURDAY, April 22. John 11 : 26. "Whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die." It is death that dies, not life. Death is but the beginning of life. What seems dying is only transition; while the body is changing its form, the soul moves into the grander dwellings.

Do we believe the Christ when he says "shall never die"? Should not this motto be engraved on every Christian tomb as it is written across the sky of hope? It is heaven's proclamation to earth's dying pilgrims. "Shall never die" is the anthem of angels, making music on the harp of the souls of mortals.

When Jesus put on his resurrection robes, he abolished death and brought life and immortality to light. We live because he lives. The Giver of life, dwelling in us, perpetuates his gift into endless cycles of ages. Our life in indissoluble union with him is coeternal with his being. It is one garment throughout, the human and the divine interwoven.

The creation of life must be a mightier act than its continuance. Then begone, unbelief, doubt and fear, for we are risen with him, and death hath no power over its Victor. He is alive forevermore and so are we in him. "Shall never die!" Shout it as the grim monster approaches; sing it in the face of all your fears, in the valley and shadow as you are triumphantly marching to Zion through death's golden gateway! E. W. C.

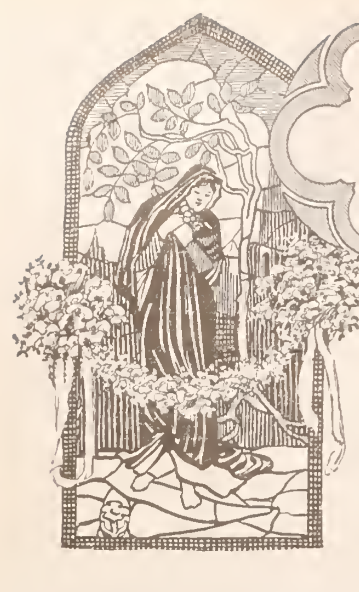
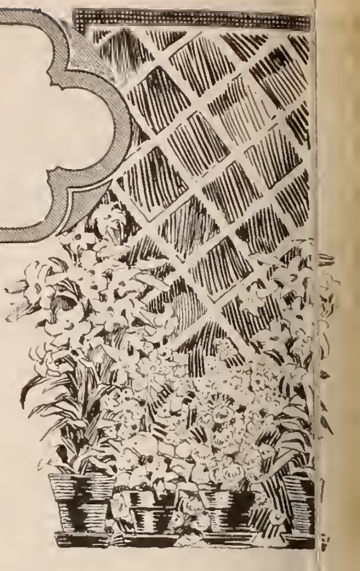
"And David said, O Lord, I pray thee, turn the counsel of Ahithophel into foolishness."—The Book of Samuel.

AS David fleeing before his rebel son climbed the hill beyond Kedron, one told him, "Ahithophel is with Absalom." Ahithophel, the wise old man whose counsel was as though one consulted the oracles of God! Well might David pray!

Even as he reached the top of the hill came Hushai, and David sent him to defeat Ahithophel.

Many a man in as sore a strait as David, like him prays. How many of us are as quick as David to recognize the answer when we meet it at the top of the next hill?





For the Easter Services

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

DECORATING the city church at Easter-time is no great problem. One calls up the florist and leaves an order; one sends a politely worded request to the church members lucky enough to own greenhouses or conservatories, and then one sits back and waits for the great wealth of blossoms to arrive. When they have arrived the problem of placing them is not hard, for the churches are beautiful to start with—architecturally beautiful—and there are so many flowers, and so many workers, and usually one or two paid decorators, that the church is soon transformed into a fragrant bower of loveliness.

To decorate the little country church at Easter-time is a problem, very often a difficult problem. For, though the little country church is no less filled with God's love than the great magnificent city one, it is often a plain little church, bare and undecorated. Usually, too, the country church is not a rich church, and for that reason it is out of the question to leave orders with the florist (if there is a florist), or hire any one to add practiced art to the natural beauty of the flowers.

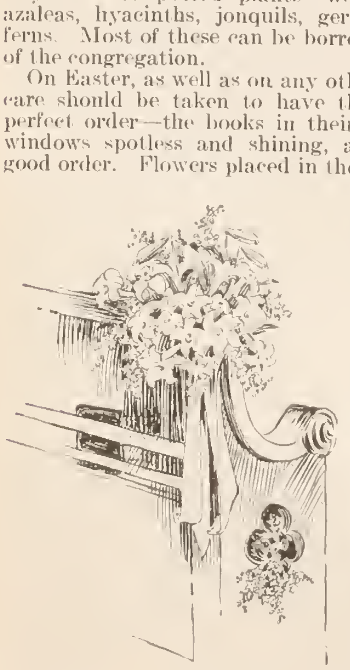
Christ, I am sure, loved the wayside flowers, and the little creeping vines, and the newly budding trees better than he would have loved the forced, artificial blossoms. I am sure, somehow, that he loved colors massed together, softly, in great clusters. Believing these things, it is not hard to decorate a church in a beautiful, simple, reverent way—as he would have wanted it decorated. And these decorations need cost very little.

There are a few difficulties to be met in the decorating of churches by amateurs, and a few hints to be given. Folk, as a usual thing, do not give enough attention to color or the beauty of line. Flowers made into a tight bunch in which yellow and white and red and pink are mingled, do not look pretty. They look crowded, unattractive, unhappy. A loose, graceful mass of flowers, in which there is only one dominant note of color, is much more beautiful.

Avoid stiffness. A stiff flower decoration can not look anything but artificial. Look at the flowers growing in the fields. Do they look stiff? If you have flowers of one color at one end of the room, have the same color predominating at the other end. If you have a large group of flowers at one side of a pulpit, have a balancing group at the other side.

Almost any flowers can be used to decorate a country church for Easter. The selection depends upon the part of the country one lives in. Down South folk may use daisies and roses and smilax. Up North there are tulips and arbutus blossoms and ground pine. Bulbs, planted in bowls of water, can be forced into bloom, and boughs from the apple, cherry and peach trees can be made to flower prematurely in the same way. As to potted plants—well, there are lilies, azaleas, hyacinths, jonquils, geraniums, palms and ferns. Most of these can be borrowed from members of the congregation.

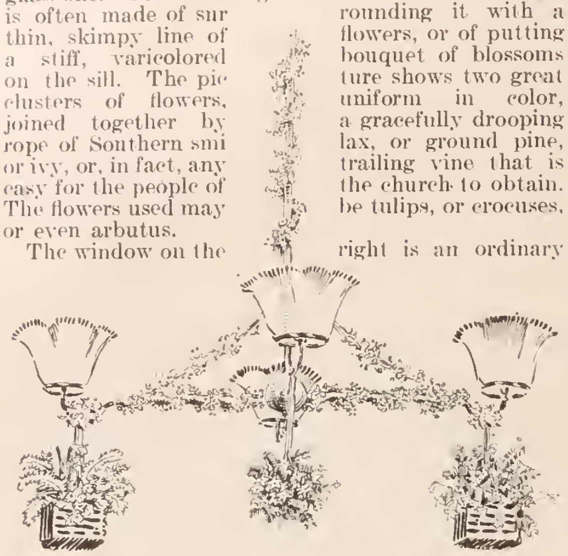
On Easter, as well as on any other Sunday, especial care should be taken to have the meeting-room in perfect order—the books in their proper places, the windows spotless and shining, and the grounds in good order. Flowers placed in the vestibule will make a beautiful greeting as the congregation arrives.



SOME time during the afternoon if the sexton or some member of the flower committee will water the flowers it will help to keep them fresh and beautiful for the evening service. After the services the flowers, if distributed among the sick and aged members of the congregation, will bring new hope and happiness to tired hearts.

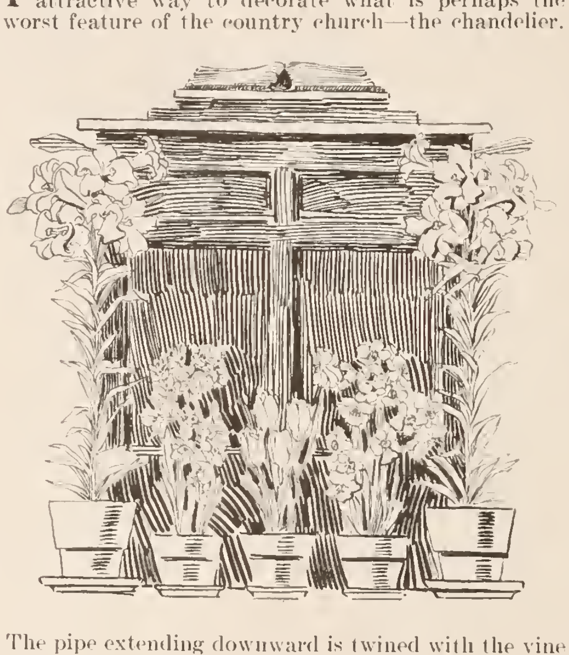
Windows, plain or of stained glass, offer difficulties that have to be met in the decorating of a church. At the heading of this page there are two suggestions that may be easily followed.

The window on the left hand is an elaborate stained glass one. In decorating such a window the mistake is often made of surrounding it with a thin, skimpy line of flowers, or of putting a stiff, varicolored bouquet of blossoms on the sill. The picture shows two great clusters of flowers, uniform in color, joined together by a gracefully drooping rope of Southern smilax, or ground pine, or ivy, or, in fact, any trailing vine that is easy for the people of the church to obtain. The flowers used may be tulips, or crocuses, or even arbutus.



The window on the right is an ordinary glass window. By making a simple latticework of building lath, painted white, and fastening waxed paper across the back, one can obtain the effect of an artistic ground-glass window. Such a window makes an excellent background for potted plants, or loose bunches of flowers banked on the sill. These flowers may be anything ranging from ferns to field daisies; but they must be uniform in color. The same method of placing the flowers can be followed if the lattice effect is omitted.

IN the center of the page there is a drawing of an attractive way to decorate what is perhaps the worst feature of the country church—the chandelier.



The pipe extending downward is twined with the vine that has been used in the decoration of the rest of the church, and the rods that hold the burners have been treated in the same manner. From the center of the chandelier there hangs a glowing mass of flowers, all of one color, and from each burner there hangs a little basket. These baskets may be simply made by tacking boards together and painting them green, or by fastening together rustic bits of wood. A potted plant may be placed in each basket, and, as the pot will not show, it will appear to be growing from the basket. The baskets must be strong, and must be fastened firmly to the chandelier so that no accident will occur.

Directly under the chandelier decoration is a charmingly simple design for a pulpit. A tall lily plant (though any other less expensive plant may be used) stands at each corner of the pulpit. To give the right effect these plants should be of the same height. Two more plants, about half the height of the lilies, should stand next to them on each side. These plants may be anything—azaleas, geraniums, daisies or jonquils—but they must be of the same color and the same height. In the middle a low jar of golden tulips would add beautifully to the color scheme and the grace of line.

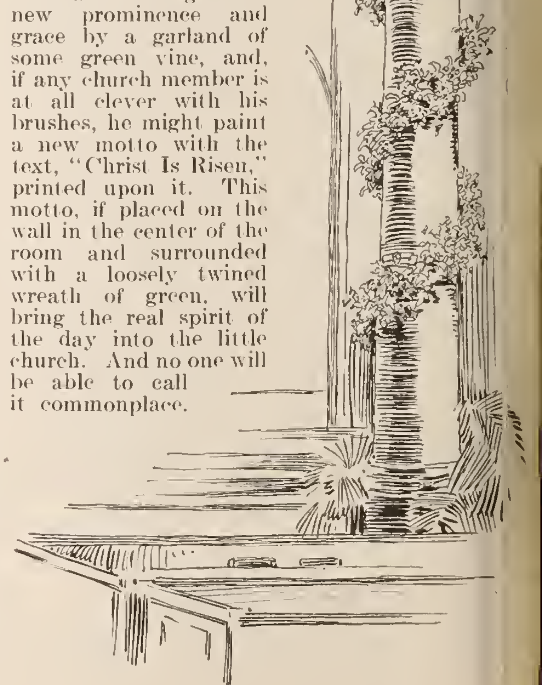
AT the bottom of the page at the left-hand side you will see the picture of a flower-trimmed pew. Unless the chu h is rather elaborately decorated this pew-trimming not necessary. Lilies are, of course, more beautifu han any other Easter flower, but any other wild bl oms may be picked and fastened in loose graceful br ches at the aisle end of each pew, every other pew, or ery third pew. This decoration will make the churc ook like a veritable garden spot.

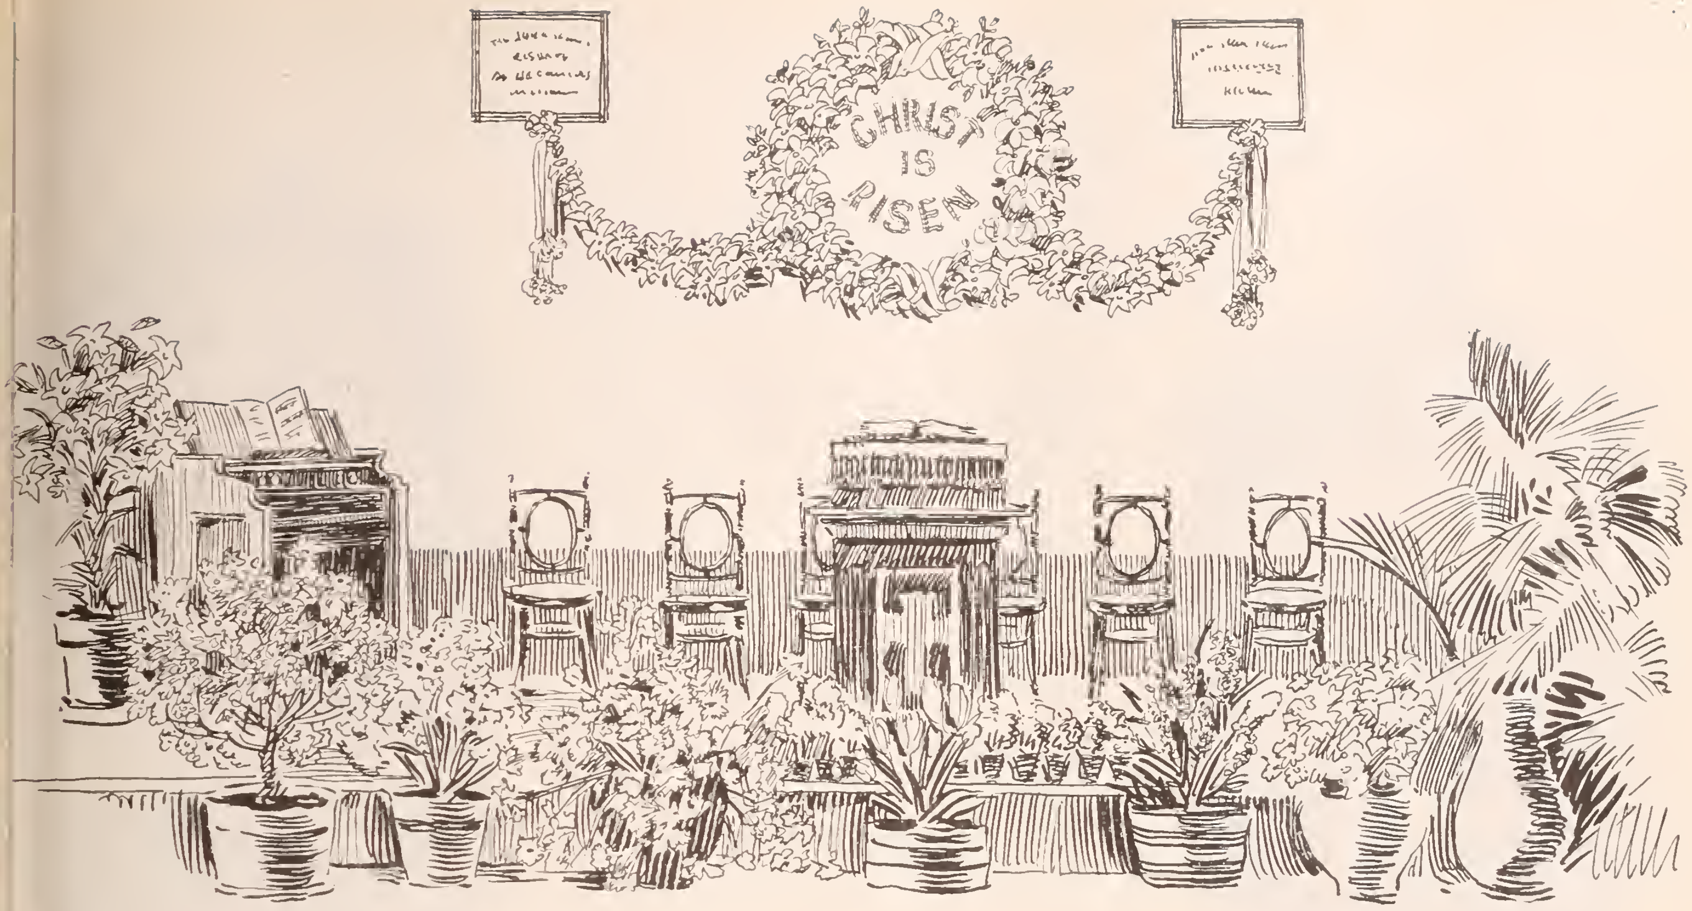
On the right hand of the page you will see a t ical church column. In some churches there are a n iber of these columns, practically holding up the r ; in other churches there are only two—one at eac side of the platform. In some churches there are i columns at all.

The column in the picture has been twined h a wide rope of vine that is fastened securely to t top of it, so that there will be no slipping. At th ase there is a graceful, and very simple, massing of ther ferns or palms, which may be borrowed—pr ably from some member of the church. If the c mn decoration is kept entirely green, with no oth ote of color, the effect will be very lovely.

At the top of the second page there is a pict e of the meeting-room of a simple little church—t sort of room that is used, in any small town, for se ices and Sunday school and the Young People's me ing. There is a low platform with a narrow pulpit the exact center of it, a row of chairs across the bac and a small parlor organ at the extreme left. The are, perhaps, framed texts or diplomas on the wall.

The decorations of this church consist mos of potted plants. They are arranged across the loor at the base of the platform; not stiffly like soldi s on the march, but in seemingly careless groups. say "seemingly," for if you will look carefully at t picture you will see how very nicely the taller pla s at each end balance each other; how the shorter pla s fit in. Great care should be taken of the color to s in this decoration. If the flowers on one end a red geraniums, the flowers on the other end should a be red geraniums; if they are yellow jonquils or lies, there should be yellow jonquils or lilies to b nce them. A tall palm or fern may be placed at t side of the organ. It will give height as well as cha cter to the otherwise rather flat looks of the pla rm. If all the pots that the flowers are planted in are wound with green crêpe paper, the effect will be excellent. The framed mottoes on the wall can be brought into new prominence and grace by a garland of some green vine, and, if any church member is at all clever with his brushes, he might paint a new motto with the text, "Christ Is Risen," printed upon it. This motto, if placed on the wall in the center of the room and surrounded with a loosely twined wreath of green, will bring the real spirit of the day into the little church. And no one will be able to call it commonplace.





t the bottom of the page there are two pictures si by side. The small picture on the left is of a ch ch that, to the untrained eye, would seem hard an expensive to decorate. The larger picture shows th same church in its Easter dress. The windows are m sed with great clusters of flowers preferably pc ed plants, for cut flowers wilt quickly. These m ses of flowers will at once relieve the stiff lines of th window and the depth of the ceiling. Potted pl ts are again used in the decoration of the platform an the pulpit, where they may again be lilies or tu s or azaleas or jonquils; anything so long as the co rs do not clash and the proper proportions are ob rved.

igh on the wall directly behind the pulpit is a gr t cross made preferably of golden-yellow or white fl ers and green leaves. The foundation of this cr s can be made of wire, board, or stiff cardboard, wi the flowers tied on. If it is too difficult to make, a eat bunch of flowers will answer the purpose and be ery nearly as pretty.

arlands of any green vine festoon the walls and lo up in carelessly draped wreaths on either side. T decoration can be dispensed with, but it adds gr tly to the charm of the room. The pew decoration, shown on the preceding page, can also be used ve effectively in this sort of church. (By placing a pi e of white paper over these wall decorations, you ca easily visualize the effect of the scheme minus the w features.)

I ONCE heard a story about a man who was a con rmed unbeliever. His wife, an earnest Christian, tr to get him to attend church services, but he st bornly refused to enter a religious meeting of ar kind. And so it went for many years, until one E er morning his wife with tears in her eyes begged hi to go to church with her.

Robert," she said, "I know that you do not be lie—in anything. I know that you do not want to be ve in anything. But won't you come to church th morning—just to give me pleasure?"

nd the man promised to go; promised reluctantly, and though he was an unbeliever he did not break promises, so he went.

The church was very beautiful that Easter morning. The air was filled with the perfume of many flowers, and ferns and palms nodded cheerily to each other. A great bouquet of lilies bloomed fragrantly at the man's very elbow, and a jar of golden-hearted daisies smiled up at him. Everywhere he looked there were flowers; simple field flowers, and rarer, cultivated ones. And the man, leaning back in his seat, felt a great peace steal over him.

All through the service he sat there, quiet. And at the closing hymn he took his wife's arm, and guided her gently down the flower-decorated aisle. When they were walking home, alone, under the brightness of the springtime sky, he suddenly spoke:

"My dear," he said, "this Easter morning has done a great thing for me. I have seen the Light—I believe!"

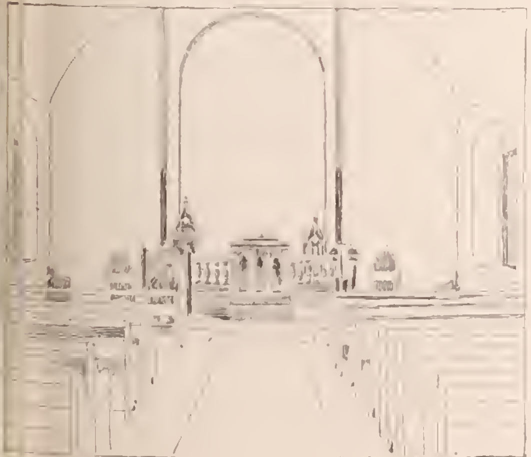
His wife cried out in joy, "What was it that made you believe?" she questioned; "was it the music, or the sermon, or — ?"

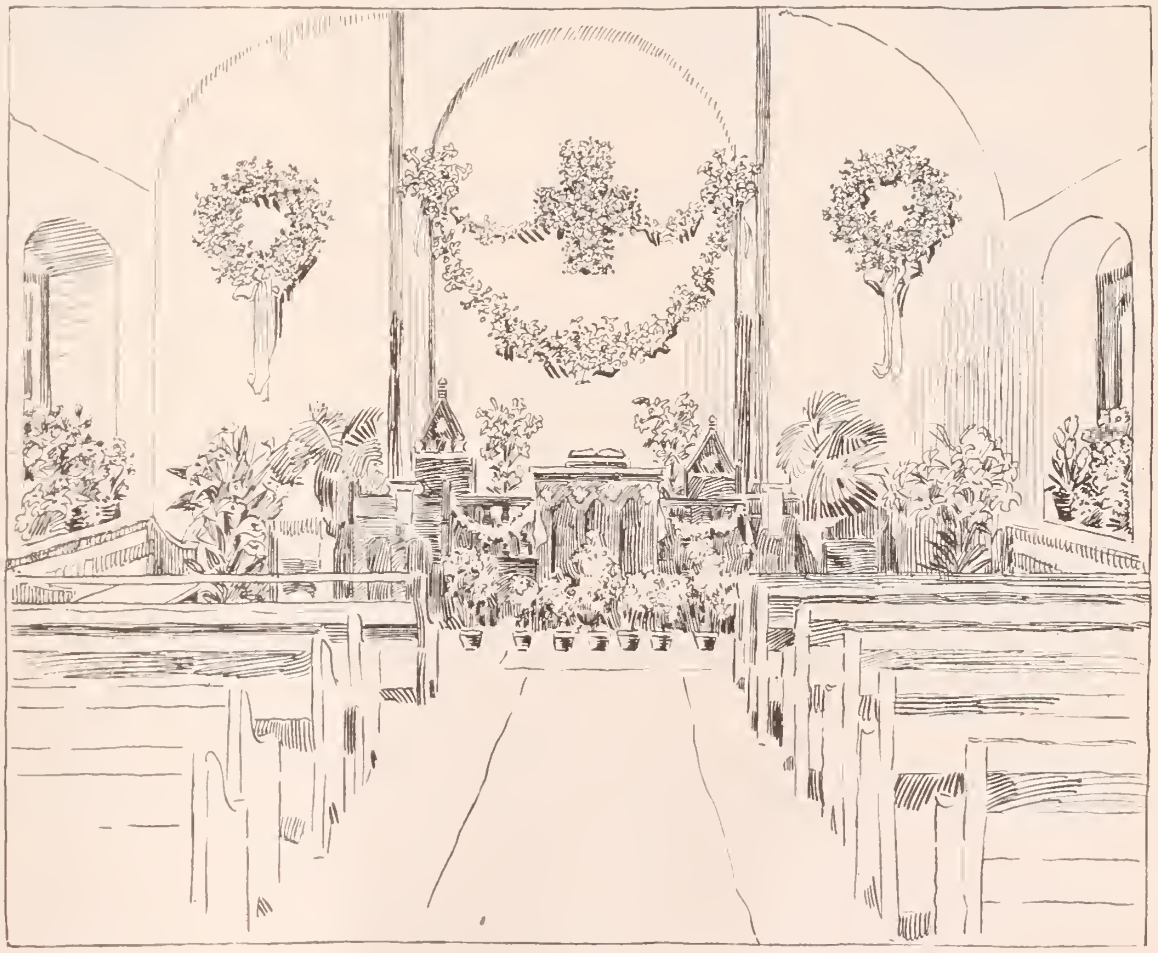
"It was the flowers," said the man softly. "When I saw them, all massed together in their beauty and purity and fragrance, I suddenly knew that only a great and wonderful God could have made them."

EASTER is essentially Christ's day. And Christ loved beautiful, simple, reverent things. For that reason, keep your churches simple, beautiful and reverent. Christ would not have enjoyed tight bunches of flowers with their poor little stems all choked up. He would have wanted them to be loosely, gracefully, happily placed. Christ would not have loved the rare orchids and the hot-house palms better than the field daisies and the nodding daffodils and the shy arbutus.

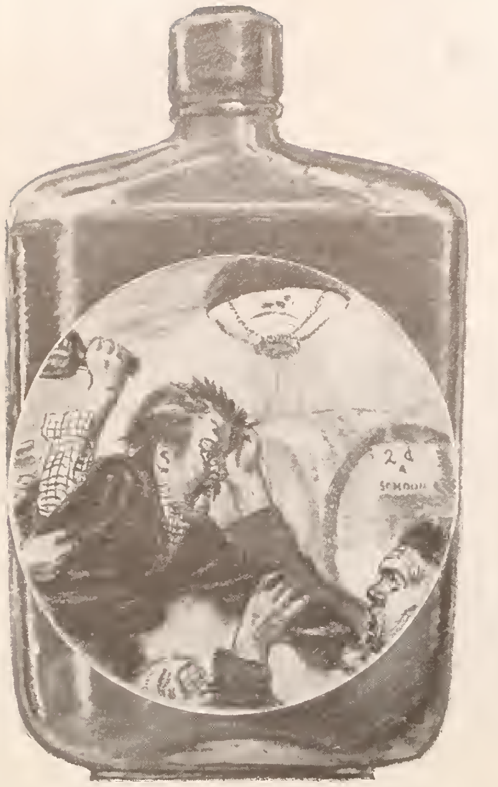
Trim your churches with an eye to color and a sense of grouping, and, above all, the spirit of love in your heart.

And your church home, blessed by God's flowers, can not fail to be beautiful and simple and reverent.





"THE BOTTLE"—VIII.



FRIENDSHIP ?

Mister John Worth.

Dear friend of old times:

Ed, my good friend, the barkeep, is writing this for me. My hand is too shaky, and I can't seem to make the letters any more.

Ed's lending me the stamp too. I'm broke.

You see, Flory disappeared with the girl the day after we buried Little Bill.

I was left all alone. Nary friend in all the world, 'cept you—and Butts.

I nearly killed Butts that night. You see, I had to forget my being all alone.

I just took a few nips. I nearly killed Butts that night. Ed says that's twice he's wrote that I nearly killed Butts that night.

I've just been out of jail a few weeks. I'm broke. Ed says that's twice that he's wrote that I'm broke. It's terribly hard for me to think any more. There was something I wanted to ask you. Yes, that's it; broke—and all alone. Old friend, I'm shaking all to pieces. Ed won't give me any more drinks. I do need something to quiet my jiggling legs and arms. Today I've been grinding my teeth all to pieces. I can't help it. This is a terrible, ghastly world. I saw two fearful crawling things today. There they are again—

(Dear sir: Your friend's gone off again. You got to act quick if you want to save him. Respectfully yours, Ed.)

Dear Old Fellow:

You got along so famously those two weeks after you were brought here; why did you sneak away, and where are you?

The gang you turned loose on my agent when he located you again nearly finished him. But he bears you no ill will. He says to tell you that the missions have pulled up fellows worse off than you are. They pray for a man, and help him in all kinds of ways. God has answered many a mission prayer. Many a man has come back.

Old fellow, you wander in there some evening. Maybe there you'll find the help you need. I have phoned a mission to call on me for anything you may be in need of at present.

Tomorrow we start on a long auto trip. How we wish you were along! Jane joins me in the best hopes for a new beginning. As always,

Your friends,

JANE and JOHN.

The Unchanged Passover Supper

By F. NASEEF, Member of the American Colony in Jerusalem

BETWEEN the mountains of Ebal and Gerizim, about forty-five miles north of Jerusalem, the city of Nablous, or Shechem, as it was called in Bible times, is situated.

As the traveler rides round the base of Mount Gerizim, he comes suddenly upon the domes and spires of this Mohammedan city nestling between it and Mount Ebal. One is struck by the difference in aspect of these neighbor mountains and by the appropriateness of the choice of Mount Gerizim for the reading of the blessings and Mount Ebal for that of the cursings, at the time when Israel sojourned there; for Gerizim is covered with cornfields and wild flowers, while Ebal is bare and stony, except for the extensive cactus hedges at its base.

In the poorest quarter of Nablous there dwell about 200 Samaritans, the only remaining descendants of the Babylonians who repopulated the cities of Samaria after the Israelites were carried into captivity, and who adopted the Jewish religion, which they have since adhered to. The account in II Kings 17 tells how they did not prosper in the land at first, and thinking that it was because the "God of the land" was wroth because they did not serve him rightly, they appealed to the king, who sent one of the priests of Israel to instruct them. They adopted the Jewish religion and came to believe themselves to be the true descendants of Abraham, and regard the Jews as impostors. It is evident, from the account of the conversation of Christ with the Samaritan woman, that even at that time there was the same feeling of antagonism between Jews and Samaritans as there is at the present day, and that then, as now, "this mountain" was the Samaritan place of worship. To them Gerizim is the true Moriah—the place of Abraham's sacrifice. The Samaritans are to this day orthodox observers of all the details of the Mosaic law.

Being in Nablous at the time of the feast of Passover, we were invited by the Samaritan high priest to witness their ceremony, which is held yearly on the summit of Gerizim. Throughout Passover week the Samaritans camp upon the mountain, and it was at the ceremony of the killing and eating of the Passover, held on the last and great day of the feast, that I was present.

We rode up the steep mountain side from Nablous, reaching the encampment about an hour before sunset. We were met and welcomed by our friend the high priest, and led to his tent to await the sunset hour. All the men and boys of the priest's family wear their hair long, and this evening they, as v l as all the men of the community, were dressed in hite robes.

AFTER carefully closing the tent flap which s ved as a door, so as to be unobserved, the high iest took from its hiding-place the box containin the precious manuscript which he has in his posse ion. It is a copy of the Pentateuch—one of the old t in existence—and is jealously guarded by the high est. It has been the cause of feud and rivalry betwe the two factions of the present Samaritans. O of these is headed by the high priest or "Kahin the other by his cousin, who claims that his own so and not that of the Kahin, is the rightful successor the high priest's office. Be this as it may, the cous has more than once obtained the manuscript, a for this reason it is so carefully guarded and hidden ay. After removing several outer cases, our host me upon the elaborately carved golden one, cont ing the worn and yellowed parchment, whose con tion testifies that it is very ancient, though no proof ists to justify their claim that it dates from the ti of Aaron.

The sunset hour was drawing near, so we h ried out to the place where the Samaritans and crowds of spectators were assembled. The Kahin took his stand on one of the pillars of an old Herodian temple, now in ruins, and read aloud the account of the first Passover (Ex. 12). The Samaritans joined in and chanted a sort of mixed-up response, which was very loud and discordant, each one trying to make himself heard, irrespective of the other.

At the Kahin's feet stood the little lambs for sacrifice, all "males of the first year, without blemish," according to Moses' command. The men who had been appointed to do the killing stood near, knives in hand, awaiting the exact moment when the sun should dip into the blue waters of the Mediterranean, according to the command "at the going down of the sun shall ye slay them."

Throughout the preparation of the lambs which followed, the strictest care was taken to observe every detail of the complicated laws for sacrifices given in the writings of Moses, particularly those dealt with in Ex. 12 and Deut. 16, which refer to the observance of this feast. Thus the blood was ceremoniously "poured forth upon the ground," "no bones were broken," and the wool, skin and waste material were "salted with salt and burned with fire," being thrown into the bonfires which were kept blazing for this purpose, and which lit up the scene.

The Samaritans stood close together to prevent the Mohammedan spectators, who delight to torment them, from snatching even a bit of wool, which would remain over and thus cause them to break the command, "Ye shall let nothing of it remain until the morning."

After cleansing the lambs, they removed a front leg of each, and these were set apart as the priest's portion. A long wooden pole was then threaded through each of the prepared lambs, and was carried thr to the pit near by, in which a large fire, which had been kindled early in the evening, had burned down, leaving a bed of red-hot coals at the bottom. The poles, protected by metal at the lower end, were stuck into this bed of coals, being long enough to reach to the top of the pit, the lambs thus suspended about half way up. A matting was placed over the mouth of the pit, which in turn was covered with earth, making a sort of improvised oven, for the law demands that "they be roast with fire, not sodden with water."

The sheep were left to roast until midnight—the appointed hour—and all but the guards retired to their tents during the interval.

Being the guests of the Kahin, we went to his tent, and he edified us by reading the various laws in Leviticus concerning sacrifices, besides the chapter which gives the narrative of the first Passover, and he explained the various points of the ceremony, telling us why each thing was done, and showing the verse in which it was ordered. He read in the Samaritan text, translating into Arabic (the language we had in common), and we followed in an English pocket Bible carried by one of the members of our party of three.

Our host then bade us partake of a little supper which was set before us, regretting that they would be unable to offer us any of the roast lambs, on account of the verse (Ex. 12 : 43) which forbids a stranger to eat thereof.

WE asked the Kahin how they account for the fact that they are so few in number, apparently dying out, since they consider themselves the true Jews. He replied, "Was it not revealed to our father Abraham, when in a vision 'a horror of great darkness fell upon him,' that his seed should go through a time of darkness? Nevertheless we believe that this will pass over, even as did his vision, and that we shall increase and become a strong and mighty nation, and inherit all the promises."

When one realizes that they were less than 200 in number at that time, fifty of these being young men of a marriageable age for whom there were no wives (as there are very few women in the young generation), and that they never marry except among themselves, one sees that their faith is great.

While we were thus passing the time in profitable conversation with the Kahin and the members of his household, we were suddenly roused by the voice of the herald proclaiming the midnight hour in loud, sonorous tones.

Every Samaritan jumped up in haste at the sound. Mothers picked up their sleeping infants; each man girded his loins in haste, put on his sandals and took his staff in hand, and hurried with his wife and little ones to the place of meeting. Sheets were spread upon the ground and one of the roast lambs all nicely browned was placed on each, while unleavened bread and bitter herbs completed the spread.

They gathered around in families, two or more combining where a lamb was too much for one family, so that "nothing be left over until the morning."

This part of the ceremony was especially impressive, for the crowds of troublesome Mohammedans had retired by this time to the city, leaving the Samaritans in peace.

The moon was at its full, lighting up the city of Nablous in the valley, the Mediterranean in the distance on the west, and the rugged slopes of Mount Ebal opposite, while the light from the bonfires illuminated the immediate surroundings and the picturesque group of Samaritans. They ate standing in great haste and silence and one could well imagine that they were about to start out on their journey from Egypt to the promised land.

As each bone was picked it was thrown into one of the bonfires, and when they had finished eating, all that remained was similarly disposed of. The ceremony being over, they all went around and greeted each other, friends and foes embracing and saying the word "Shalloam" (peace) before retiring. We therefore thanked our hosts, and bidding them farewell started down the steep mountain side, reaching Nablous in the small hours of the morning.

Our Relief Work in Galicia and Bukowina

PROBABLY no part of war-stricken Europe has suffered more from the great international conflict of the last twenty months than Galicia and Bukowina. Over a year ago the Christian Herald War Widows and Orphans Relief Fund organized a committee especially for providing assistance to the unfortunate wives and children who had suffered bereavement in these two Austro-Hungarian provinces. After many delays incident to the Russian invasion, and the conditions that followed, our relief work was begun ing a competent committee and has gone on steadily ever since.

We have just received a very complete report from the committee which will interest all of our readers, and especially those who have had an active share in this great work of mercy, which is now being conducted in eleven different countries in Europe and the near East by the subscribers of the Christian Herald:

Vienna, Austria,
February, 1916.

Your favor of the 21st December, 191 was duly received by us, and we now take great pleasure in rendering you report of the work done by our committee, with your kind help, which is highly appreciated by all.

Our report will comprise the time from June, 1915, to the end of January, 191 for the reason that Galicia and Bukowina were under Russian occupation during the first half of 1915 and were partly liberated in the months of May June and July. Only after the liberation of the above-mentioned provinces was it possible for the widows to learn whether their husbands were dead or alive, and to give us the necessary information. There was another obstacle which hindered our work a little at the very beginning, i. e., the postal communications, which were only gradually and slowly restored in the liberated provinces, and therefore the public at large was able to learn about our committee only in the second half of last year and to send us the petitions for help. Such circumstances limited our activities a little, but nevertheless we commenced from July, 1915, and are now continually expanding.

Complying with the expressed wishes of our esteemed central committee, we distributed the relief among the poor orphans and widows whose fathers and husbands had died in the present war, without any discrimination whatsoever as to nationality or faith. First of all, we announced in the official newspapers of Galicia and Bukowina the existence and aim of our committee. The advertisement appeared in all the officially recognized languages, viz., in Ukrainian, in Polish, in German and Rumanian, as the enclosed copies of the advertisements will testify.

Our committee holds weekly sittings, and during the period of time between July, 1915, and the end of January, 1916, has considered 762 petitions. Of those petitions only 331 received pecuniary help from our committee. Among them are Ukrainians, Poles, Jews, Germans and Rumanians, and people of different denominations, Greek and Roman Catholics, Evangelicals, Orthodox and those of the Jewish faith—mostly the widows of poor peasants. The wage-earners and proletariat, on the whole, derive the benefit from our funds.

The remainder of the petitions were disposed of as follows: 24 were handed over to other charitable committees for consideration; 26 are temporarily laid aside; 81 are awaiting further precise information before adjustment (information relating to financial standing and family relations are here lacking); to 300 petitions we had to decline material help, because the applicants had no claim on our committee, being neither widows nor orphans.

We distributed the relief by giving a certain sum, and that only a small one, to the petitioner, this for the reason that we had no very great sum at our disposal, and secondly, we always had to bear in mind that the number of widows and orphans would be continually increasing, especially in Galicia and Bukowina, where the fiercest conflicts have taken place, and in which mostly local regiments participated and fell.

To be more precise, we present our report in tabular form, separately for each month:

Month and Year		Sum distributed	Number helped
July,	1915	260 kronen	12
August,	1915	3,690 kronen	163
September,	1915	4,815 kronen	143
October,	1915	2,885 kronen	115
November,	1915	4,230 kronen	173
December,	1915	7,550 kronen	339
January,	1916	9,220 kronen	379
	Total,	*32,650 kronen	1,324

*The Austrian krone is worth 24¼ cents of American money.

THIS humane work of your esteemed organization, instituted solely at your suggestion and with your material support, finds wide recognition and sincere appreciation among our people. This appreciation is often being voiced in the press, and one illustrated journal (German) of high repute has published a long article about our work with several illustrations.

To complete the report of our financial standing from the beginning of June, 1915, to the end of January, 1916, permit us to add the following administrative costs:

1. We engaged one clerk, a lady, widow, whose husband died in the present war, and her salary amounts to	kronen	775.00
2. Rent for office apartments	kronen	641.68
3. Light and heating	kronen	110.57
4. Books and application blanks	kronen	251.85
5. Office requisites	kronen	175.46
6. Postage	kronen	161.84
7. Sundries (service, errands, etc.)	kronen	120.00
8. Advertising expenses	kronen	360.36
9. Office fixtures (tables, desks, etc.)	kronen	293.40
10. Traveling expenses	kronen	162.00
Total	kronen	3,052.16

The total expenses are:

1. Help given to 1,324 persons for the whole period of the existence of our committee	kronen	32,650.00
2. Costs of administration	kronen	3,052.16
Together	kronen	35,702.16

In submitting this report to the honorable committee of the Christian Herald Relief Fund, we beg your kind attention to the following: Our committee here in Vienna has received a great number of petitions, in which the petitioners are:

1. Aged people, invalids, parents or near relatives, whose life depended upon the soldiers who fell, who ask us for material help.

2. Civil persons wounded or crippled on the field of battle.

3. Many women and children whose husbands or fathers were taken by the Russians as civil hostages of the war and transported to Siberia.

4. Many whose entire property was either stolen or burned up by the enemy send us petitions and fervent requests imploring help. These cases present a picture of the direst misery, and in almost all cases, the condition of the petitioners is far worse than that of a poor widow or orphan of the war. We were sorry to decline aid to these pitiable victims of the war, but we had to, in order not to go beyond the limits defined for us by your honorable committee. We now beg you, in the name of these miserable and stricken people, to allow us to give them some help from the funds donated by the Christian Herald Relief Fund, and if possible to send us further remittances in order that we may continue this humane work with your kind and inestimable help. If you do not agree to our helping all the above-mentioned categories, at least let us help the first two.

WITH the funds we still have in hand we hope to continue the good work for another two or three months. Perhaps it will be less by that time, for the petitions are now daily coming in in increased numbers.

For the help rendered to our stricken people, our committee send you their warmest and heartiest thanks, for you came with a helping, brotherly hand among the poorest of the poor. Words do not suffice to convey the gratitude we feel toward your honorable committee and the generous American public, to whom please express our thanks.

Before concluding, please allow us to submit to the committee of the Christian Herald Relief Fund of New York our present request. We humbly petition the Christian Herald Relief Fund:

1. To remit some more funds, that we may continue the good work of helping the widows and orphans, and

2. If possible, to send us a certain sum for the aid of some of the poor mentioned by us above under four categories.

We shall be very thankful for your kind consideration of our request.

Once more we thank you for all the good you have done for us, and recommending ourselves for your future consideration, beg to remain,

THE COMMITTEE OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, NEW YORK, FOR THE RELIEF OF THE VICTIMS OF THE WAR IN GALICIA AND BUKOWINA.

WLADIMIR RITTER VON SCHILLING SINGALEWYCZ, Secretary.
JULIAN ROMANCZUK, Chairman.

AN additional remittance will be made from the Fund in response to this earnest appeal, and in the confidence that it will reach the most deserving cases. It should be mentioned here that the gentlemen composing the committee give their personal services to the relief work gratuitously, as do the members of all the other committees in the different countries.

Let the President Speak

OUR troubles in Mexico have been complicated by the peculiar situation along the border. There is a modified censorship on news from the front, where our troops are conducting their punitive expedition, but on the border there has been a crop of alarmist rumors almost daily. These reports do not bear the mark of ordinary sensation-mongers. There have been false stories circulated of wholesale disaffection among the Carranzist troops, who were declared to be deserting to Villa by thousands; of outrages against the Americans which had not a shred of foundation; of enemy forces gathering and threatening to invade us.

While it can readily be understood that sensational reports at such a time might arise out of popular excitement, these stories do not belong to that class. They are canards put in circulation with a definite purpose. This fact is so apparent that President Wilson has issued a public statement stigmatizing the rumors and their authors in these very plain and unmistakable words:

> It is my duty to warn the people of the United States that there are persons along the border who are actively engaged in originating and giving as wide currency as they can to rumors of the most sensational and distressing sort, which are wholly unjustified by facts. The object of this traffic in falsehood is obvious. It is to create intolerable friction between the government of the United States and the de facto government of Mexico, for the purpose of bringing about intervention in the interest of certain owners of Mexican properties. . . . The people of the United States, who know the sinister and unscrupulous influences that are afoot, should be on their guard against crediting any stories coming from the border.

"Traffickers in falsehood" is an appropriate characterization of the men, or the interests, that are trying to make serious trouble between Mexico and the United States. That there are interests which would be financially benefited by the overthrow of the de facto government and the defeat of its liberal policy, which aims to restore the land to the people, is well known. This is also within the knowledge of the President, as his statement quoted above clearly shows. As he has considered the matter sufficiently serious to make it the subject of an official denunciation, why not bring out all the facts, and let the people know just where the danger lies? If there is actually in existence anything in the nature of a conspiracy to precipitate a war between this country and Mexico, the identity of the plotters should be made known and their purpose fully exposed in the press of the country. In adopting such a course, the President would have the loyal support and approval of every good American citizen.

Our troops are in Mexico, cooperating with the forces of the recognized government of that country in hunting down a notorious outlaw and rebel, who for several years has been a disturbing element, and whose treacherous attack and slaughter of Americans in Columbus was the bloody climax of his murderous activities. Both countries seek to punish him in the interests of peace and justice. For any man or party of men to seek to fan the incident into a flame of war, when both governments are working harmoniously together, is a crime that deserves universal detestation.

Three United States Senators—Messrs. Lodge, Gallinger and Smoot—have already emphasized the duty of the Administration to disclose all the facts on which the President's charges are based, and to name openly the conspirators. Compliance with such a demand would give immense satisfaction to the whole country. Social position, influence and wealth should not be permitted to screen men who, for the sake of advancing selfish material interests, would deliberately plan to bring about a situation which might mean the loss of thousands of American lives.

The Jewish World-Program

THERE was something of the old Maccabean spirit in the temper of the Jewish assembly which met in Philadelphia recently to prepare for the great Jewish Congress in December next. Among the four hundred representative Hebrews who had been chosen for this occasion by a million of their race, there was not one dissenting voice on the great questions brought under discussion. Factionism was fused, differences were buried, to clear the path for a great forward movement of the race. Rabbi Stephen S. Wise gave the gathering its keynote. He reviewed the history of a century of Jewish effort at securing political and civil freedom. He held that the time had now come to make speedy pronouncement as to the future course of Israel. With great changes impending throughout the world, there would be an end to secret diplomacy and a beginning of control by the people themselves of their national and international relationships. The program of the coming Congress must no longer be one of palliation and relief, but of prevention and redress.

It was evident from the speeches generally that, while the asssembly was ready to pay tribute to the genius of Herzl and his vision of the rehabilitation of Jewish power in Palestine, the beautiful ideal must be set aside for the more practical and immediate purpose of lifting the race out of its age-long oppression and setting it on the solid rock of world citizenship. Deferred but not forgotten, the hope of the centuries was voiced in the decision of the Philadelphia gathering that the coming Jewish Congress must give consideration to the project for the colonial development of Palestine, and that the whole Jewish world must be asked to cooperate.

There is nothing in the whole range of history sadder than the record of Jewish oppression in the last century in Europe, especially in Russia and Poland. Our Jewish citizens in America have seized an appropriate opportunity to record their demand and to make their protest in behalf of their suffering brethren in the old world. Christendom owes an amende to the Jew, and it should be given in the form of a voluntary granting of their full rights, civil, political and religious, in every country under the sun.

An Easter Blessing for Our Work

WHY did Jesus tell his disciples to meet him in Galilee after he had risen from the dead? Two accounts of the Easter narrative mention specifically that he was to meet them there. In Matthew's account he commissioned Mary Magdalene and the other Mary: "Go tell my brethren that they go into Galilee; and there shall they see me." Mark adds that the angel at the tomb gave this same direction: "Go your way. Tell his disciples and Peter that he goeth before you into Galilee. There shall ye see him." Luke's account does not specifically mention Galilee, but John tells of Simon Peter and the rest going back to their own Galilee homes and to their old task of fishing in the lake.

Jerusalem and Galilee! Jerusalem meant memories of those last strange days with the Saviour; his earnest talks about the Father in heaven, and about the demands and possibilities of the spiritual life; it meant memories of his strange agony in the garden, of the flaring torches and the swinging staves of those who came to arrest him; horrible memories of that night in the judgment hall; hideous memories of his death pains on the cross; bitter memories of his tomb, sealed with a great stone.

From all this atmosphere of strange fellowship with this heavenly Friend and strange grief at their loss of him, they were to go back into Galilee, where in days long ago they had fished and farmed and mended nets. They were soon to come back to Jerusalem again. That was to be the center of the new movement. But the reorganization of their scattered flock; the new conference with their Master; the new start for the new work—these were to take place in old Galilee, the land of their home and their work. There were, later on, to be days of spiritual exaltation and spiritual service, but these were to be balanced by the common memories of common life and common toil. Christ's great Eastertide meeting with his friends took place in Galilee.

There is apt to be a great deal of froth and frivol about Easter. Costly music, costly flowers, costly costumes. Ministers are apt to spend the sermon hour arguing over again the solidity of the Easter history. Traditions will be stated, doctrines expounded, rituals defended. There will be much vanity, pomp and display.

All the while Jesus is saying: "Go tell my brethren that they go into Galilee. There shall they see me." Galilee! Where people toil, hunger, suffer and die. Galilee, where the Roman soldiers go marching through, seeking captives and plunder. Galilee, where there are little towns and humble homes. Galilee, where there are carpenter shops, and fishing boats, plowers and sowers and reapers. Galilee, where there is not only toil and laughter, but sickness, and, in every village, death. Back in real life the followers of Jesus shall find their Saviour, really alive again.

One of the most potent causes of the midnight of the Dark Ages was the misconception that in order to be holy Christ's followers must get away from life. This idea led to the gloomy horrors of monasticism. The church had forgotten the words of Jesus' prayer: "I pray not that thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from evil." Where people are working, and suffering, and ping. and fearing—there the disciple will find his Lord. As we try, not only to do our own work, but ease the burden of the oppressed, to dry the tears f the sorrowing, to cheer and help and console our ne ibor, we shall, not only on Easter day but every da find the Risen Saviour with us, strengthening our ands.

Suffer!—Little Children

THERE have been most regrettable d elopments in the process of the investiga on of the New York State Board of Charitie This investigation was directed by G ernor Whitman as the result of charges made agai the State Board by John A. Kingsbury, Commissi er of Public Charities of New York City. The pul was horrified at the original disclosures, which d of shocking conditions among the little childr the babies, the older children and the men and wom who are dependent for their maintenance upon ficial charity. Most deplorable was the condition f the little children, many of whom were found to b iving in conditions of filth and distress.

Jewish, Protestant and Catholic institution ame in for their share of criticism, and it does not pear that one class was any better or worse than a ther. But the Catholics resented more vigorously th the rest the assaults made upon their institutions l got themselves into deeper trouble by circulating hu lreds of thousands of pamphlets denouncing the whole inquiry as a "slander factory," and, it is eged, calling upon their people to oppose at the bal box those who have been responsible for the in ption and conduct of the investigation. There were arges and countercharges as to the actual authorshi f this pamphlet, but Mgr. John J. Dunn, chancello f the Catholic Archdiocese of New York, in attem ng to explain the situation before the commissio nade matters much worse by declaring: "In fa my interest in charity work is very limited."

There is strong reason for hoping that muc good will come out of the whole affair. Church aut rities and public authorities must take an interest in arity after this. Dr. Ludwig B. Bernstein, superin dent of the Hebrew Shelter Guardian Society phan Asylum at Pleasantville, New York, declared

> There is a desire to raise the standard; and somet ng has been done, but there is more to do. It will not cost ich to bring the different institutions up to a reasonable s ndard. We want the children to have a square deal, and, as e city pays $1,300 for every ten children, it has a right to d and a square deal. An extra $1,000 spent would be all that old be needed in the smaller institutions and $3,000 in othe Th end of this investigation will be an awakening that wi enefit the 22,000 dependent children of the city, the 35,0 of the state, and the 75,000 of the country.

Such disclosures as have been made by this estigation are almost disheartening. Welfare rkers have boasted that we are now living in a d that could be called the "Day of the Child" bec se so much attention was being given to the child's rture and development. But we seem almost to b going back to the days when even a great religiou inger could write in cursing an enemy-nation: ' appy shall he be, that taketh and dasheth thy litt one against the stones!"

With childhood exploited in America's f orie and sweatshops, neglected and stunted by lack care for widow-mothers, by lack of employment d by underpayment for unfortunate fathers, by t barbarous and unreasonable conduct of refo atory institutions, and, we are learning at last, by cr l and shameful treatment at the hands of those ap inted to give them "charity," we know that there ar nany living in this supposedly enlightened day wh vould merit the curse of the Children's Friend: " were better for him that a millstone were hanged al ut his neck, and he cast into the sea, than that he ould offend one of these little ones."

Church Speaking Clubs

IT has been said in recent years that the rt oratory is dying out, largely through ck of cultivation. This may or may not be p isely true, but it is a fact beyond question t the desire to be able to "stand on one's feet and y the game" is a very general one. A progressive Texas pastor, Rev. Hugh McLellan of the Central C stian Church of San Antonio, has introduced a new ature in his church activities. He recently announce from the pulpit that he proposed beginning a work mong the older boys and grown men of his paris t teaching of practical public speaking. The r ponse was large and immediate, and included men c nany ca ngs: students, brokers, lawyers, architects, a ba president, a railroad superintendent, clerks, do ors, and salesmen. The pastor, who is himself th conductor of the elocutionary classes, explains th his object is not merely to give training that will aic hem in their business and social life, but which wi have a religious influence as well. "The ability to hink clearly, to say what one should say and no mo," he explains, "will prove helpful to many who ha not had the benefit of such training in the sc ols. If carried out generally, I believe it would he the churches too, doing for the adult man what th Young Men's Christian Association has done for th American boy. There are many who have some mc age which is really worth while but who are too tin to give it utterance." Pastor McLellan's plan co ins a suggestion for other ministers who wish to en gize their church workers. There are in every co regation many good, serious Christian men and wo en who would make almost any sacrifice to be ab to "speak out in meeting" in acceptable fashion. Th do not strive after eloquence, but simply for cle speech. It may be mentioned that one of the res ts of the Texas pastor's work has been the organ-iza n of a speaking club among the lawyers of the Sa Antonio bar. Speaking clubs in connection with ch h work might not be a bad idea.

Seven Suicides

A NEW and gruesome record was set in New York the other day, when within twelve hours seven persons committed suicide in that city. One of these was a young man, sev teen, the son of Austrian parents; the next, an Iri laborer; the third, a German woman, fifty-seven yea old; fourth, a Bohemian dyer, fifty-one years old the fifth, a young Polish laborer; the sixth, a yo Russian Jewess; the last, a young Italian wife.

hat strange unknown sorrows could have led the sad people to make their sudden way out of the wo ? Surely there is gladness enough to go round. Ne York is crowded, but these dear people need not ha felt that they were in the way. Strange to say, he roblems of poverty and unemployment do not see to have been prominent in their cases. The old, ma swerable mystery of sorrow pressed down upon he too heavily and they determined to venture out nt he unknown rather than to bear any longer the hea burdens of life.

I seems particularly sad that all but one of these eve victims of grief had come to the New World's rea city of opportunity from distant lands. From rel d, from Germany, from Bohemia, from Poland, ro Russia, from Italy, they had come seeking la cess, only to find grief and death. New York and th American cities need many things, but one of he chiefest needs is the need of neighborliness. h d-clasp, a word of sympathetic understanding, a it real effort to cheer, such slight things as these ig have held these people back from their untimely ra s. There must have been a Christian church it a few blocks of each of the seven homes that hel red these broken hearts. Did these churches y touch and win and hold them? Had they done ha they could to make life worth living for them and f their sad hearts with hope? It happened seven m in New York that day—"While thy servant was us here and there, he was gone!"

Jekyll and Hyde in Real Life

WHEN Robert Louis Stevenson, thirty years ago, wrote his gruesome allegory of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, he told it as a revelation in a dream. Today we have its ar el in real life. The old proverb that truth is ra er than fiction has received a new demonstra-on n the case of Dr. Arthur Warren Waite, the ot ous poisoner, the story of whose startling in is now being read everywhere. The dentist ois er, however, was dissimilar from Jekyll in one p tant point: he seems to have had neither moral ns nor human feeling. He had apparently planned his wife's entire family for the sake of their ea . His familiar spirit, as he explains it, was " n from Egypt" who haunted him day and night, hi ring "Kill! Kill!" This suggestion of de-o c possession is probably a myth, or at least an te ought, intended to prepare the way for a plea anity. Waite played a gambler's game with e d death, his tools being deadly germs and poison-is rugs. He has already confessed to a double ur r, and had it not been that he was caught by e t of the law in the middle of his criminal career, uld doubtless have succeeded in adding largely t number of his victims. An inordinate desire alth was the motive for what he did, and ex-ai his fondness for contact with germs and cultures d is habit of surrounding himself with virulent is s. He brooded incessantly over his plan to t h quickly. No life would have been too sacred, it ood in his way.

O significant statement, made after Waite's con-si , tells the whole story. "If I had believed in d he said, "I would never have done what I did." s an avowed atheist, and not until he was a isc r, with the awful consequences of his crime n nting him, did he make anything like an appeal ine help. It was the despairing cry of a moral g rate, the last hope of a man who had forfeited everything through his crimes and who was now seized with a fear that wrung from his lips an appeal to God, whom all his life he had neglected to honor or acknowledge.

One of the disclosures of the case that has aroused public attention is the fact that germs of deadly diseases can be purchased from almost any bacteriological laboratory by anyone who represents himself as a physician. Waite bought his test tubes of typhoid and diphtheria bacilli from one of the largest laboratories in the state. He never was a physician and held no license, yet he could purchase the means of killing innocent people and of spreading disease through a community. Such conditions should be made impossible through appropriate legislation.

"The love of money is a root of all kinds of evil," saith the Scripture, and surely it was so in this case. Multitudes have gone to social and spiritual ruin through the desire to get rich quickly. Wealth, so gotten, has not only wings but stings.

Degrading Sport

IT was probably to be expected that the Willard-Moran prize-fight in New York should have drawn down a storm of denunciation from the metropolitan pulpits. If from 15,000 to 20,000 men and women, representing all classes of citizens, had gathered to witness a bull-fight, paying over $175,000 for the privilege, the whole nation would have sustained a moral shock. Yet many will fail to note any material distinction between such a scene and the spectacle that took place in Madison Square Garden on March 25. It was not an uplifting sight to see two men hammer each other, while the spectators were roused to a frenzy of enthusiasm at every blow, and especially at the sight of blood. That such scenes brutalize the public cannot be questioned. Whatever may be said in favor of boxing as a scientific athletic sport, the bloodthirsty crowds who screamed with delight at every brutal blow cannot be said to have been attracted by any regard for the science of the game.

The plain truth is, the time has come for New York, and our other cities as well, to purge themselves of the whole shameful business of prize-fighting. It is probably the lowest of all sports and the most brutal, and it should be banished from every community in the country. Our existing laws on athletic exhibitions are disgracefully lax and need to be amended to exclude prize-fighting altogether. Our churches and decent citizens everywhere should unite their efforts to make this exhibition the last of its kind. The whole business is irredeemably low and demoralizing. Its influence upon public morals is degrading. Wherever such a spectacle is permitted, it inevitably attracts to the community the very worst class of gamblers and blacklegs. New York should never again be disgraced by such a spectacle. Three days after the fight a bill was introduced in the State Senate to abolish the State Athletic Commission, which gave its sanction to the encounter, and to prevent prize-fighting in the state hereafter.

The Old Charm or the New?

ARE the poets themselves already tiring of the French vers libre? Do they long for the sympathetic, old Parnassian harness, with its easy-flowing, rhythmic lines, its melodious, balanced cadences, that sound like music in an old-fashioned flower-garden? Are they growing restive under the strain of too much freedom of expression—of the inordinate latitude that tumbles off here and there a syllable or two, and which is disdainful of all the old regulative conventions that have hedged in the muse till now? These thoughts are suggested by the perusal of a notable little volume of poems by Mr. Arthur Ketchum, a versifier well known to magazine readers. He voices his longings in these lines, entitled "Escape":

> I said I would have done with thoughts,
>   And names and labels.
> This shall be no more a tree,
>   Or that a flower,
> Or colors, green and blue and red,
>   Or love, or hate or joy:
> For I am sick with the disease of Thought
>   And its delirium, Imagination,
> But laying my lips to the Great Cup,
>   I will drink deep of beauty,
> Wordless, colorless, without name or thought,
>   And I shall be whole.

His book contains some capital poems in both the old and new measures, and it is evident that he finds his chiefest joy and highest inspiration in the old. There are doubtless many others who feel as he seems to do, that the rhymeless poem is a thing of the moment, and will pass like the tango and other immoderate exotics, into the soothing limbo of things discarded and soon forgotten.

The Quest for Happiness

AMONG the Indians of Guatemala, who possess many remarkable traditions, a legend has been preserved which might form a theme for the poet or the moralist. At the foot of Mount Sucareb lies a lake, placid and beautiful in its solitude. At a certain season of the year, there come to the surface—so says the tradition—a huge, glittering, gold-maned serpent, and a water-maiden, who is the counterpart of the Lorelei. Her singing has an irresistible charm to draw the casual listener, who is promptly seized by the golden serpent and dragged down to the lake's bottom. There he is delivered to a giant, who is the guardian of a secret treasure hidden in a cave. What that treasure is no one knows; but it is something for which all men seek. Some believe it to be a mass of priceless jewels; others aver that it is a charm which is capable of curing all human ills. But the oldest and wisest of the tribesmen wag their heads knowingly and say that the hidden treasure, which no human power has ever succeeded in grasping, is Happiness, and that the great deity who directs the lives of men has placed it beyond their reach. All through the ages men have sought for it but failed to grasp it, and many have perished in the attempt.

It is only an old heathen legend, yet it pictures the ceaseless search for happiness which has gripped the human heart ever since time began—a search in which love and wealth are the lures that woo to danger and even death. Those who are wiser and whose understandings have been enlightened know that happiness comes unasked to him who serves God and his fellow men, and who makes his life a blessing to others. To such a one there comes, some day, an experience like that of the humble tiller of the soil who, having been true and faithful, helpful and kind, found Happiness standing beside him at the plow, a serene and comforting heavenly comrade. Both are legends and strangely beautiful, but our own hearts tell us which of the two has the real charm of spiritual truth.

Harnessing Power

ENOUGH physical power is thrown away every hour to do the world's work many times over. Scientists tell us that sunlight alone can be harnessed and made to accomplish mammoth tasks. The power of billions of horses goes flowing away in unbridled rivers and streams. The power in the ocean tide is almost infinite. Now science is planning to harness the famous tides of the Bay of Fundy.

When we read of the Bay of Fundy most of us probably think of two books—our geographies and Lowell's poems. For Lowell put the Bay of Fundy into verse in "The Courtin'." You remember when 'Zekel asked the immortal question, that to Huldah's face, which had just gone white in trepidation, the crimson floods rushed back

> "like the tide
> Into the Bay of Fundy."

The tides of Fundy rise as high as fifty feet. Even at the city of St. John they rise twenty-eight or thirty feet. As these floods pour in from the ocean and back again furious currents are formed, and it is these that may soon be harnessed and put to work.

There is material here for deep and high thinking. What measureless forces are at the Christian's disposal if he will but avail himself of them! "I will work," declares Jehovah, "and who shall hinder it?" 'I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments and do them." "I have chosen you and ordained you," said Jesus, "that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain; and whatsoever you shall ask of the Father in my name he may give it you." What hinders us from saying with St. Paul: "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me"? "It is God who worketh in you both to will and do of his good pleasure."

How can our lives be weak and fruitless with such resources at our disposal? "According to your faith be it unto you!"

Comment by the Way

THE Moving Picture business has had an astonishing development. According to a contemporary, there are now 350 producing companies, a much smaller number of distributing agencies, 17,127 moving picture exhibitions, at least 20 star actors under contract at over $1,000 per week, one actress who is receiving $200,000 a year, and a comedian whose net receipts will exceed $600,000 per year. Sometimes as much as $100,000 is spent on a single production.

SUFFRAGE and prohibition received a violent setback when the House Judiciary Committee on March 28, by a vote of ten to nine, decided to postpone, without date, consideration of the bills before it dealing with these two questions. A resolute effort was made by the friends of both measures to have a separate vote, but without avail. Another effort will be made during the present session to bring up the suffrage question and get a report on the Susan B. Anthony amendment.

WHEN the war toll which the last twenty months have taken from the bright lights of the world of art, letters and science is finally summed up, it will make an amazing showing. It is said that two thousand French painters have died in the trenches, while hundreds of musicians, writers and actors have fallen. Germany has given a large share of her brightest talent to the struggle, while in Russia and Italy the ranks of literature, art and music have been sadly depleted. England, too, has paid a heavy tribute of its best-trained men in almost all the professions, and some of the larger universities are practically without students this year. Even the neutral countries have given their tribute of fame and talent to the war, the latest being Enrique Granados, the noted author of operas, who perished with his wife on the ill-fated steamer Sussex off the coast of France.

A Week in the World's News

IN REVOLT AGAINST MILITARISM. According to special correspondence of the New York Evening Post, the Socialist party, the strongest in Sweden, is leading a great revolt against militarism. The Socialists have been called "defense nihilists," and defense nihilism has been defined as the doctrine that war is such an evil that non-resistance to even the worst aggression is preferable. Swedish Socialists claim that the army is a preserve for hard-up counts, most of the officers belonging to the nobility, and that soldiering in any form is butchery. It took a popular demonstration of 30,000 peasants to force the Swedish government to strengthen its defenses early in the present war. The Socialists are now said to be running a systematic campaign to undermine the army. Insubordination in the fortress of Boden, which guards the Swedish frontier against Russian aggression, has been traced to Socialist activities. Hundreds of the soldiers were said to be going into anti-war and anti-discipline meetings, and the town itself was reported to be a hotbed of defense nihilism. Anti-militarist secret committees are being organized throughout Sweden.

PILING UP GOLD. According to the report of the Federal Reserve banks for the week ending March 24, the Federal Reserve banks had gained $7,700,000 in gold reserves and $8,600,000 in cash reserves. The earnings of the banks have increased $3,400,000. The present gold reserve is reported at $342,124,000.

SILK WORKERS WIN SHORTER DAY. Twenty-five thousand silk workers of the Paterson, N. J., district some time ago notified the Silk Manufacturers' Association that unless a nine-hour day were granted by April 3, a referendum strike vote would be taken by the union. On March 25 the silk manufacturers, after having offered a nine and one-half hour day, which was refused, granted the demand of the union for a nine-hour day throughout the plants.

FOR SWEET CHARITY. A recent investigation has shown that in New York City, exclusive of the public service, there are more than 4,000 men and women employed professionally in organized philanthropic and charitable work. Of the workers reported, 1,111 are men, 2,857 are women, and their efforts are guided by 368 organizations. In addition to these, there are 100 other organizations from which the investigators were unable to get information. Salaries were found to range from $600 a year to $5,000 a year.

FOG COSTS THIRTY LIVES. At least thirty persons were killed and forty injured in a collision on the Lake Shore division of the New York Central line near Amherst, Ohio, early in the morning of March 29. The first section of train No. 86 eastbound running in two sections had been brought to a stop by a caution signal, and was just getting under way when it was telescoped by the second section, which had run by the block. The press declares that the tower man responsible for the block signal was fighting a handicap of sleepless hours with a sick wife, and it is not certain that he had the signals set to stop the second section. The engineer of the second section was positive he saw no red danger signal, but in the enveloping fog the light, even if set, might have been invisible. The crumpled wreckage had scarcely settled back on the right of way when the engineer of the first section heard the thunder of the Twentieth Century Limited approaching at full speed on the west-bound track and pulled his whistle to give the stop signal. The engineer of the Limited immediately applied his brakes, but it was too late. The engine and all but three of the Pullmans of the Limited left the rails, but no passengers were injured on this train; the killed and injured were all in the telescoped day coach in the first section of the east-bound train. All of the cars in the three trains were steel cars. Some of the deaths were due to scalding, the boiler of the engine of the colliding train exploding and deluging the wreck with boiling water.

ECONOMY ON THE CANAL. The tug De Lesseps, built for the first French-Panama Canal Company in 1883, which made the voyage across the Atlantic from Scotland to Panama under sail and which was beached after the failure of the second French company and later reclaimed, overhauled and placed in service by American engineers, has recently been completely overhauled again, being fitted with new boilers and equipped to burn oil fuel. A new deck house and wheel house of the modern tow-boat type were erected and a new deck was laid. The De Lesseps is 72 feet long, 15 feet beam and nine feet in depth and is especially well fitted for work in the Gaillard Cut to which service she has returned, having been out of commission just twenty-three working days. Considering the millions lost in discarded French untensils, this is true American enterprise.

REFUSING CITIZENS. On March 25 Judge Clemons of the United States District Court of Honolulu denied citizenship papers to a Japanese, Takao Ozawa, who had been for twenty years a resident of Honolulu and a leading citizen. The court held that the constitution limited naturalization to white persons and that the Japanese were Mongolians. Citizenship was granted to two Filipinos.

WORTH SAVING. Early in the present war the German steamer Walküre was seized by the French and renamed the "Republic." A few weeks later, in September, 1914, while at anchor in Tahiti Harbor, the Republic was sunk by shells from the German squadron nder Admiral von Spee. A syndic e of San Francisco capitalists boug the vessel from the French governm t for $29,000 and secured its admis n to American registry. It was ther aised by the cofferdam process, the re vered cargo reimbursing the owners r all the expense of salvage. The essel reached San Francisco March 2. nder her own steam and the owner were reported to be considering an er of $1,200,000 for it.

CHINESE REVOULTION NOT DEAD. The self-abnegation of Yuan S Kai in becoming a mere president a n instead of an emperor has see d to avail him little. Dispatches of larch 29 reported that two more dis ts of Kwangtung Province had join the revolution, two military stations aving been occupied by revolutionist while a third military station had lared its independence. The rebel inese governors are reported to ha demanded the immediate retire nt of Yuan. Yuan is said to have o nized a formidable army, and the el ce of a civil war in China, which w ld be both long and destructive, seen to be becoming daily more certain.

THE WORK OF CONGRESS. I egan to be apparent early in the we that the Burnett Immigration bill, t principal controversial feature of w h lies in the restricting of immigra n by means of the literacy test, was lmost certain to pass Congress by large majority. The vote was taken larch 30 and the bill was passed 30 o 87. The "head tax" on immigra s was raised from $4 to $8, but it was vided that it should not apply to im rants under 16 years of age. On M h 2 Secretary Baker asked the H se to include in the emergency defici y bill an appropriation for the pay l sustenance of the army for the re inder of the fiscal year. The S etar estimated that the Mexican ex lition would cost a million and a half. On the 28th the bill passed both the House and the Senate, the army appro iation being $8,611,502.11. The Sen vote was unanimous, the single vote gainst the bill in the House being cast b Meye London. On the 27th, Repres tative Rainey of Illinois introduced a vised bill for the creation of a tariff mmission. p ide a single presidential term of six y s. Mr. Howard's bi would prevent the exportation of pe oleum products, and Mr. Steenerso 's bill would give the Federal Trade C mission full authority to regulate th price of gasoline and petroleum prod s in interstate commerce.

rogress of Chase After Villa. O March 28 Villa was reported to have be checked south of Namiquipa and do led back toward the north. Americ cavalry was then within a half da s hard riding of the fugitive. Gener Pershing was, however, getting im tient with the slow movements of e Carranzista troops. On the 29th it as reported that Colonel Dodd's co mn had been shifted to the western sl of the Sierra Madre Mountains; an that they were operating, with the to of Madera as their base, in the Sa a Catarina canyon region, Villa ha ng been reported in that neighborho within twenty-four hours. Somewl of the extent of the country in w h the American troops are operating ca be gathered from a remark by a ne trooper, who said: "I have been in early every land, but in this part of M ico there are more rivers and less wa r, more cows and less milk, and fa ner to look and less to see than in an country I have ever known." As to e situation of Villa, another trooper ex essed it that our soldiers were pr ing forward, but "they've got hi surrounded only on one side."

n March 30, Carranza granted permi ion for the use of the Mexican N hwestern Railway in the shipping of nerican supplies, but at last reports th hipment of supplies, except for one tri shipment, had not been begun ac ely, as the Carranza commander at Ju ez had not yet received definite in uctions to permit the shipments. O larch 30 it was reported that Felix Di with a party of adherents had la d in Mexico near the boundary be een the states of Campeche and Ta sco. The report of the landing wa afterward denied. On March 31 Vi was reported to have massacred, on he 28th, 172 men of the Carranza ga son at Guerrero, and to be in the ne borhood of the San Geronimo ra near Guerrero, where troops of bo the United States and Mexico were then closing in on him. The American forces came in contact with the main body of Villistas on March 29. A force of some four to six hundred American troopers of the Seventh and Tenth (negro) regiments under Colonel Dodd, after seventeen hours of unbroken riding, covering more than fifty miles, in which forty men were "ridden out of their saddles," approached Villa's camp. Through the narrow ravines and arroyos at the foothills of the Sierra Madre range, through which they had been trailing the fleeing bandits, the troopers rode out into the valley just as the bandits were rising after their night's encampment. It was six o'clock, and the force under Colonel Dodd, although inferior in numbers to the Mexican force which they had surprised attacked immediately. The Mexicans stood their ground for a brief and fierce encounter, and then fled to their horses. A running fight followed, in which Colonel Dodd and his men, in five hours, chased the Villistas for more than ten miles down the valley. The Villista forces had then broken up into small bands of six or eight men each, and had scattered in all directions into the mountains. Villa was reported not to have been in the fight, but another report said that early in the action he was placed in a light wagon and was driven away rapidly.

Villa has been reported as seriously wounded, and is said to be suffering with a broken leg and a shattered hip, but in some quarters this report was considered as a blind to throw General Pershing's men off the track. In the action on March 29 General Hernandez, Villa's second in command, and sixty Villistas were known to have been killed. A large number of wounded were carried off by their comrades. The American forces captured two machine guns and a large quantity of arms, ammunition and other material which the bandits had been forced to leave behind in their camp, and liberated a large number of Carranzistas who had been prisoners of Villa. Four American cavalrymen were slightly wounded. If Villa is really wounded and unable to ride, it is expected that Colonel Dodd, by pushing his advantage, will be able to overtake and capture him within a few days, and at last reports the Americans were scouring the country thoroughly with a slowly advancing screen of troops. A report persisted that Villa had been captured, but it could not be confirmed from any official source either Mexican or American.

To Cheapen Gasoline. It was announced on March 31 by the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce that the automobile manufacturers represented by the organization had decided to form a company for the making of gasoline on a large scale. The plans were reported to be well matured. The object of the company will be to produce gasoline, kerosene, lubricating oil and other products of petroleum to demonstrate that gasoline can be produced and sold profitably at a price lower than that now prevailing. The annual consumption of gasoline in the United States is 1,747,200,000 gallons, which means that if the new company can reduce the price one cent a gallon it will save more than $17,000,000 a year to consumers.

Would He Have Uncle Sam Import Them to Eradicate the Dove Pest? On his return to New York from the West Indies, ex-President Roosevelt told of a new bird which he had discovered in Trinidad. The native name of the bird is guacharo. Some of the natives call it the diablotin or little devil, and it lives in the caves of Trinidad and feeds on nuts. The bird has the appearance of a whippoorwill, but is as big as a barn owl, and makes a considerable noise when it is abroad. It was necessary for the Colonel and his party to sleep in the caves in order to observe the habits of this new bird, which they feel certain is of a variety not yet catalogued.

The Bible in the Schools. The state of New Jersey has recently passed a law, approved by the governor March 25, requiring the reading of five verses from the Bible in each schoolroom in the state on every day of the school year.

Panama Canal to Open April 15, Weather, Etc., Permitting. On March 10, Donald F. McDonald, former canal geologist who spent several years on the isthmus making a careful study of the geological conditions and the results of seismic disturbances, reported that the whole isthmus is rising at the rate of three feet every hundred years, but that this movement of the earth will not necessarily injure the canal. It is his opinion that the slides at Culebra will eventually be overcome, and that there is no danger of the sinking of the Gatun dam and locks. It was announced from Washington on March 15 that a dispatch had been received from the acting governor of the canal, stating that conditions in Gaillard cut justified the prediction that the Panama Canal would be available for ships of thirty feet draft on April 15, subject to probable temporary delays due to the dredging of the canal to full width and to the removing of shoals. The canal has been closed to traffic since September.

Noted Educator Dead. President emeritus James B. Angell of the University of Michigan died at Ann Arbor, April 1. President Angell was the oldest college president in point of service in the United States, having served forty-eight years first as president of the University of Vermont and then as president of the University of Michigan from 1871 until 1909.

Preparedness For What? Politicians of both Republican and Progressive Parties were left with a large question mark in their minds by the report of a meeting April 1 at the home of Robert Bacon between ex-Senator Elihu Root, Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts, General Leonard Wood and Theodore Roosevelt. Mr. Root as chairman of the Republican Convention in Chicago in 1912 had been supposed to be outside of the pale of Mr. Roosevelt's regard. But they were reported to have lunched together, to have grasped hands. Colonel Roosevelt and Mr. Root both agreed that the only topic of discussion at the luncheon was preparedness.

Our Cover Picture. The Lenten cover this week in Mr. Ortlip's series of Prophecy Pictures shows Christ triumphing over sin. The prophecy referred to is found in Genesis 3 : 15, in which the Lord declares to the serpent: "I will put enmity between thee and the woman and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." Sin bruised the body of Jesus on the cross, but in his death there he destroyed the power of sin. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews describes in vigorous and emphatic language the completeness of Christ's victory over evil: "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil." Heb. 2 : 14. Next week's picture will show David dreaming of the miracle of the empty tomb.

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

THE Russians have been extremely active most of the week ending April 1 on that portion of the battle line in northern R ia extending from near Riga, on h gulf of the same name, eastward o e vicinity of the river Duna, and h e southerly parallel with the o se of that river to a point slightly o he west of Dunaburg, thence di- e y south to the Lake region.

he storm centers on this front were h region to the west of Jacobstadt, h district immediately west of Duna- n and the district just west of Lake N ocz.

he fiercest of the fighting took place o west of Lake Narocz, the scene f vere fighting for the past two or h weeks, and where the Russians an advance of some local impor- a on March 20. The Russians p ed this last week's fighting with ong attack in great force on the an positions, Sunday and Monday, finally were repulsed. The Ger- s then attacked in their turn and ceeded in recapturing the ground n from them on March 20.

e reason for the Russian offensive n his northern line, begun three s ago, is that last autumn when the ans established their line for the er they arranged their trenches reference to the topography of the try, selecting the crests of such ridges as run north and south, occasionally through this low, swampy country, and leaving the Russians to occupy the lower portion of the territory facing them. Now it so happens that behind the Russian positions run the river Duna and other watercourses innumerable, and as the deep snows of the winter melt these streams overflow and deluge the low country in their vicinity, in which low country the Russian trenches run. So that the Russians were obliged to attempt to drive the Germans from their positions on the higher ground, or to retreat eastward themselves and abandon the positions they now occupy.

Very little news indeed has come to us during the past week concerning the Russian campaign in the Caucasus and in Persia. From time to time the Russians have announced vaguely that they were pursuing the Turks in the Caucasus, but gave no details, so that it is very difficult to form any idea of what is really happening, the Turkish bulletins being equally vague. Mesopotamia has only been dignified with one report (Turkish) during the entire week, and that concerned an unimportant skirmish in a place unfindable on any available map. We are perhaps justified in inferring that the situation there is unchanged.

One result of the war which deserves some notice is that Turkey has, to an extent, reformed its calendar so as to coincide, as far as months and days are concerned, with the Gregorian. The year, however, will still be counted from the Hegira, so that according to the new calendar our April 1, 1916, would be according to this new Turkish calendar, April 1, 1334.

The British made a rather extensive air raid on the Turks at Bir-el-Hassanah, 100 miles to the east of the Suez canal, on March 24, and, according to the account, inflicted considerable damage on the Turkish camp there, all the aviators returning in safety. One of these aviators, the story runs, accomplished the remarkable feat of routing single-handed a body of Turkish infantry by descending to within 100 feet of them and spraying them with his machine gun.

The submarine activity has been very great since March 15. The British are willing, it is reported from London, for the American Commission for the Relief of Belgium to charter German ships in neutral ports. This illustrates rather forcibly the tremendous shortage that exists in ships, as if it were not for this shortage it is inconceivable that such permission would be given by the British government.

A conference of the principal military and political authorities of all the Allies was held in Paris this week, lasting from Tuesday till Friday. Among other things this question of ocean shipping and ocean freight rates was taken up, freight rates having now climbed to almost unbelievable figures, and measures are taken, it is reported, to arrest this upward tendency by combining all the ocean carriers of the Allies and fixing rates. As a sample of how ocean rates have advanced it may be mentioned that in May, 1914, carriage from River Plate ports to Great Britain was 5 shillings a ton, and on March 25, 1916, 175 shillings was quoted.

Parliament was again occupied by the question of calling up all the married men of military age to the colors this past week. Sometime ago Mr. Asquith stated that he would not remain a member of any government which introduced general conscription, and as the government cannot get enough single men at all, and cannot get enough married men without conscription, it will be quite interesting to see what Mr. Asquith will do in this dilemma.

Last Saturday there was an extensive air raid by the British on Schleswig-Holstein, northern Germany. There was a battle between small craft in the North Sea, wherein the British lost the Medusa, and the Germans two armed trawlers and a torpedo boat. What the results of the raid itself were are not definitely known.

In the early part of last week a spurt

Gold Traveled Sixteen Years

AFTER traveling for thousands of miles during sixteen years, a sack of gold dust mailed in 1899 was delivered recently to Christopher Lalone of Potsdam, N. Y. The gold dust started at Dawson City, Alaska, being sent by Frank Wires, Mr. Lalone's son-in-law. It was part of the first treasure taken from a mine which young Wires discovered while prospecting, and which later yielded him a fortune. The first address attached to the sack was Schenectady, where Lalone was living. Before it arrived, however, Lalone had left that city, and after a few months the gold was sent back to Dawson City. Wires, the sender, was far from civilization, and his whereabouts unknown. Unclaimed, the sack lay in the Dawson post office until it was learned by a friend of Wires that Lalone was in Terre Haute, Ind. There the package was sent, but again too late. Since then it has traveled to Seattle, to Southern California and back to Alaska, until finally Lalone was located at Potsdam. Three tags, bearing twenty addresses, were attached to the sack. Gold does not usually chase a man as this sack did. Men generally chase gold, very few of them, comparatively, securing the sack of yellow dust. Gold hardly ever overtakes a man whose migratory spirit is excessively developed. The gold caught up with the traveler because the United States Post Office Department is so splendidly organized, and because its employees are so honest. How many opportunities there were to steal that sack during the sixteen years! In no department in public or private life is the standard of integrity higher than in the mail service of the United States, where the principle required by the apostle is recognized: "That ye should do that which is honest." (II Car. 13 : 7.)

How the earth looks from an aeroplane

A BIRDMAN photographer recently went up into the air 2,500 feet and took snapshats of various sections at the Long Island Sound shores. Some of the most significant discoveries of science in the past century have been those of photography and of the various improvements made in it. Men have stood on the earth and have photographed the heavens with their bright jewelry of worlds, bringing into view myriad stars that since the world began had not been observed by mortal eye. And naw men are gaing up into the air and taking pictures of the earth. This aeroplane photography might enable some birdmen of the Orient to fly over aur Pacific coast and picture its defenses, or some of Eurape to fly over the Atlantic caast and act as scouts. But we are not gaing to have enemies la menace us on the Pacific or Atlantic. We are going to have an era of peace and good will, prepared to protect ourselves, but trusting God far our own and the world's peace. These masteries af science reveal man's royal nature and divine image: "For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and hanor (Ps. 8:5.)

Baby Boy a Hero

FOUR-YEAR-OLD August Benderanga is a hero. In a fire recently on Spring Street, New York, he risked being burned to death to save the life of his baby sister. When his mother went shopping, she told August he must not leave the chair in which Grace, his seven-months-old sister, slept. The mother had been gone a little while only when a piece of wood, falling from the kitchen stove, set fire to the tablecloth. The baby's chair was only a few feet away. August beat at the cloth with his chubby fists in an attempt to put out the blaze. His efforts were in vain. The fire spread to a cot in a corner of the room. It began to creep toward the chair in which the baby was sleeping. The boy made frantic attempts to put it out. He called loudly for help; none came. He broke down and started to cry. He wanted to run away, he said later, but he loved his sister too much to leave her. He began to pull the chair toward the door. Although nearly suffocated by smoke, he dragged the baby to temporary safety. The rungs of the chair were so hot he could drag it no farther. The little fellow then tried to lift his sister out of the chair, and had partly succeeded, when his mother returned just in time to get the children to the street in safety. What a level head this little chap had! His love for his sister was sweet, it was heavenly; his risking death to save her was divine. There are heroes on the battlefield under all flags, some of them wearing decorations for singular bravery in behalf of others, but there is none greater than little August, the four-year-old baby boy of the downtown tenement district of the metropolis, who risked his own life to save that of his sister, giving an illustration of Christ's heroism thus defined: "He that findeth his life shalt lose it: and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." (Matt. 10 : 39.)

Handled $25,000,000,000

ALFRED R. QUAIFFE, vault clerk of the United States treasury, celebrated his eightieth birthday in Washington City the other day. What singular honesty this man had to render a half century of service handling money without a single penny sticking to his fingers! What constancy of disposition to remain at a job of so great responsibility for so long a period of time! This constancy of integrity and of spiritual service is enjoined by the apostle by these words: "Be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labar is not in vain in the Lord." (I Cor. 15 : 58.)

Melon-Cutting for Workmen

THE General Electric Company at Schenectady on March 21 announced that it would distribute between $3,000,000 and $5,000,000 in bonuses to its employees in all plants of the company for five years or more. Fifty thousand men will receive 5 per cent. of a year's salary in two instalments, one on or before August 1, 1916, the other on or before February 1, 1917. It is good economy on the part of capital to give impulse to the energy of the mind and muscles of the body. Aside from the justness of the division of the result of human industry (though many prefer that the division be in the form of wage or salary), there is an increased productiveness which makes it a good business proposition. The value of the interest the workmen take in their work in material enterprises is thus illustrated: "So built we the wall; and all the wall was joined together unto the half thereof; for the people had a mind to work." (Neh. 4 : 6.)

The New York of Alaska

Copyright, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

I WANT to give you some pictures of Seward, the New York of Alaska, and named after Lincoln's great Secretary of State. It is the terminus of Uncle Sam's new railroad, and it will be the great ocean port of the future. Its citizens are already comparing it with Stockholm, the capital of Sweden, which has almost 400,000 inhabitants. They claim its location is similar, and that it will be the gateway to resources equal to those of the four Scandinavian countries. They point out that Norway, Finland, Sweden and Denmark, which are in the same latitude and have much the same climate, have a population of over 12,000,000. They say that Alaska will some day have 20,000,000, and that Seward will be its chief maritime city.

Two years ago not one man in a hundred could have told where Seward is located, and I venture that nine-tenths of those who are reading this letter will have to go to a map to find out. It is on the great Gulf of Alaska, at about the middle of the southern coast of the territory. It is at the lower end of the Kenai Peninsula, about as far from Ketchikan, where the Seattle steamers first call, as the distance between New York and Cleveland, and it is only a little farther than that to the Unimak Pass of the Aleutian Islands, through which the ships go on their way from Seattle to Nome.

Seward is six days by steamer from the Puget Sound ports. It is about as far from Seattle as from New York to Sioux City, or Omaha, and the fare is $45. When the new railroad is completed it will be less than 500 miles from the terminus at Fairbanks, from where steamers can go via the Tanana and Yukon to a great part of the interior of Alaska.

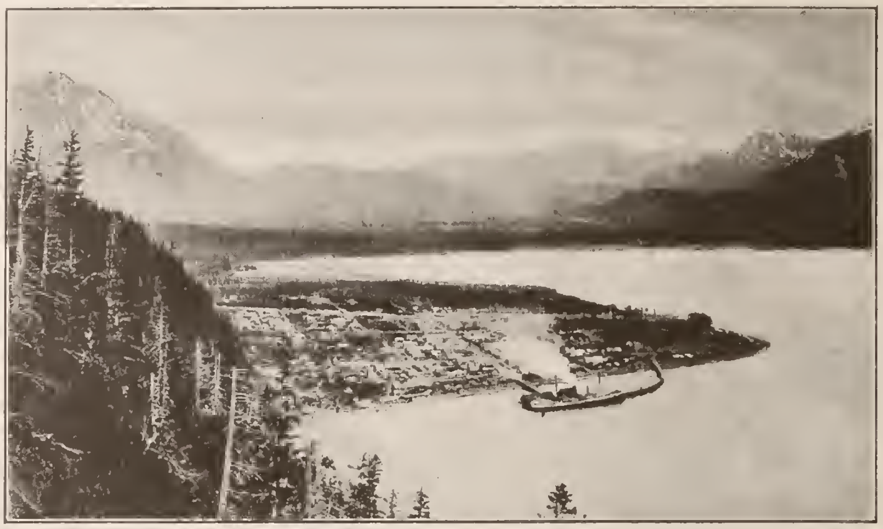
The harbor of Seward is Resurrection Bay, a magnificent inlet, whose waters are surrounded by mountains and so guarded by islands that here, in the midst of this region of terrible storms, the ships lie as quiet and safe as they do inside the docks of Hamburg and Liverpool.

BUT let us take a bird's-eye view of the harbor and town. I have come from the wharves and tramped through the business and residence sections to the foot of the wall of the great mountain that rises straight up on one side of Resurrection Bay. I have climbed the wall, making my way through the moss and pulling myself from one tree root to another until I now hang high above the town and harbor, writing these notes.

The wall is precipitous. It rises straight above Seward, to a height of several thousand feet, losing itself in the great range of mountains that bounds this side of the harbor, and runs back into the interior, fading away into the snow-capped regions behind. The first hundred feet are covered with green trees, some of which are twice the girth of my waist. They cling to the rocks and grow straight up, forming palisades, as it were. Among them are bushes, making a jungle that reminds one of the lower slopes of the Himalayas. From where I hang I can see giant ferns, young alder trees and salmonberry bushes, the whole growing out of a deep bed of moss into which my feet sink as though into feathers. There seems to be no earth between me and the rocks. The moss covers the rocks, and the trees and bushes are imbedded in it.

At my left, looking out through the green branches of spruce, I can see the white glacial waters of Lowell Creek, roaring as they rush foaming over the rocks down into Resurrection Bay. They cut through the upper part of the town and pass under Uncle Sam's railroad embankment which runs round the harbor.

Turning my head, I can see Resurrection River, which comes in at the end of the bay, and looking over the inlet where the bay ends another mountain wall rises before me. Its peaks are of black volcanic rock and in its hollows nestle glaciers of pale green ice that the sun has turned into emeralds. High up on the mountain sides are patches of snow that shine like silver against the black cliffs, and below, rising a thousand and more feet from the water, is the great blanket of green trees and bushes that is to be found everywhere throughout southern Alaska.



The future great ocean port of Alaska, Seward, terminus of the new government-built railway

This forest-clad wall extends to the end of the harbor, where it drops into the sea. Beyond it are the mountainous islands that guard the bay and make it almost landlocked. At first sight the land seems continuous, but there is a narrow passage between Fox Island and the Kenai Peninsula, so that the shipping of the world can sail in and out.

The bay itself is about sixteen miles long, and it is protected on all sides from the gales. Its waters are from six hundred to twelve hundred feet deep. Indeed, the depth is so great as to be an objection; the only really safe anchorage outside the wharves being at Sunny Cove, on Fox Island, where for the space of about 320 acres the water is so shallow that ships can lie there.

ON the north side of the bay and running back to the mouth of Resurrection River is a plain covering many acres. It has enough space for a large city, but as yet the only part that is covered with houses is a spit of land that juts out into the bay. It is here that ships lie at the wharves. The wharves are built upon piles, and just back of them the business section of the city is located. For a distance of perhaps one-third of a mile the ground rises, giving excellent drainage. The streets climb the hills to that point, and then go over a slope which rolls gently on until it reaches the mountain wall in the rear.

The residence section of Seward is over the hill. Beyond that are the suburbs, which now consist of ma tent and shacks growing out of the tump of the newly cleared land. Th bette class residences are pretty bu galow and artistic cottages. Nearly hav smooth green lawns, with flows and grass and plants of one kind or other

By GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL LUTZ

CHAPTER XXII

WHEN it became known that the new teacher wanted above all things to purchase a piano and that to that end she was getting up a wonderful Shakespeare play in which the scholars were to act with a stage set with tree boughs after the manner of some new kind of plays in the East, the whole community began to be excited.

Mr. Tanner talked about it much. Was not Bud to be a prominent character? Mr. Tanner talked about it everywhere he went. The mothers and fathers and sisters talked about it, and the work of preparing the play went on. Margaret had discovered that one of the men at the bunk house played the flute, and she was working hard to teach him and the Fiddling Boss and another to play a portion of the elfin music to accompany the players. The work of making costumes and training the actors became more and more strenuous, and in this Gardley proved a fine assistant. He undertook to train some of the older boys for their parts, and did so well that he was presently in the forefront of the battle of preparation and working almost as hard as Margaret herself.

The beauty of the whole thing was that every boy in the school adored him, even Jed and Timothy, and life took on a different aspect to them in company with this high-born, college-bred, Eastern young man, who yet could ride and shoot with the most daring Westerner.

Far and wide went forth the fame of the play that was to be. The news of it reached to the Fort and brought offers of assistance and costumes, and an order for tickets for every one there, although of course they could not all leave at once. Margaret purchased a small duplicator and set her school to printing tickets and selling them, and before the play was half ready to be acted, tickets enough were sold for two performances, and people were planning to come for fifty miles around. The young teacher began to quake at the thought of her big audience and her poor little amateur players; and yet the children they were doing wonderfully well, and were growing quite Shakespearian in their manner of conversation.

"What say you, sweet Amanda?" would be a form of frequent address to that stolid maiden Amanda Bounds, and Jed instead of shouting for "Deli[illegible]te at recess as in former times would say:

"My good Timothy,

I swear to thee by Cupid's strongest bow;
By his best arrow with the golden head;"

until all the school yard rang with classic phrases, and the whole country was being addressed in phrases of another century by the younger members of their households.

Then Rosa Rogers' father one day stopped at Tanner's and left a contribution with the teacher of fifty dollars toward the new piano; and after that it was rumored that the teacher said the piano could be sent for in time to be used at the play. Then other contributions of smaller amounts came in, and before the date of the play had been set there was money enough to make a first payment on the piano. That day the English exercise for the whole school was to compose the letter to the Eastern piano firm where the piano was to be purchased, ordering it to be sent on at once. Weeks before this Margaret had sent for a number of piano catalogues beautifully illustrated, showing pictures of how the whole instruments were made, with full illustrations of the factories where they were manufactured, and she had discussed the selection with the scholars, showing them what points were to be considered in selecting a good instrument. At last the order was sent out, the actual selection itself to be made by a musical friend of Margaret's in New York, and the school waited in anxious suspense to hear that it had started on its way.

THE piano arrived at last, three weeks before the time set for the play, which was coming on finely now, and seemed to the eager scholars quite ready for public performance. Not so to Margaret and Gardley, as daily they pruned, and trained, and patiently went over and over again each part, drawing all the while nearer to the ideal they had set. It could not be done perfectly, of course, and when they had done all there would yet be many crudities; but Margaret's hope was to bring out the meaning of the play and give both audience and performers the true idea of what Shakespeare meant when he wrote it.

The arrival of the piano was naturally a great event in the school. For three days in succession the entire school marched in procession down to the incoming Eastern train to see if their expected treasure had arrived, and when at last it was lifted from the freight car and set upon the platform the school stood awestruck and silent with bated breath, as though at the arrival of some great and honored guest.

They attended it on the roadside as it was carried by the biggest wagon in town to the schoolhouse door, and they stood in silent rows while the great box was peeled off and the instrument taken out and carried into the schoolroom. Then they filed in soulfully and took their accustomed seats without being told, touching shyly the shining case as they passed. By common consent they waited to hear its voice for the first time. Margaret took the little key from the envelope tied to the frame, unlocked the cover, and sitting down began to play. The silence that spread over that room—the rough men who had brought it standing uncovered around the platform—would have done honor to Paderewski.

Margaret played, and played, and they could not hear enough. They would have stayed all night listening, perhaps, so wonderful was it to them. And then the teacher called each one and let him or her touch a few chords just to say they had played on it. After which she locked the instrument, and sent them all home. That was the only afternoon during that term that the play was forgotten for a while.

AFTER the arrival of the piano the play went forward with great strides, for now Margaret accompanied some of the parts with the music, and the flute and violin were also practiced in their elfin dance with much better effect. It was about this time that Lieutenant Forsythe discovered the rehearsals and offered his assistance, and although it was declined he frequently managed to ride over about rehearsal time, finding ways to make himself useful in spite of Margaret's polite refusals. Margaret always felt annoyed when he came, because Rosa Rogers instantly became another creature on his arrival, and because Gardley simply froze into a polite statue, never speaking except when spoken to. As for the young officer, his attitude toward Gardley was that of a contemptuous master toward a slave, and yet he took care to cover it always with a form of courtesy so that Margaret could say or do nothing to show her displeasure, except to be grave and dignified. At such times Rosa Rogers's eyes would be fastened upon her with a gleam of hatred, and the teacher felt that the scholar was taking advantage of the situation. Lieutenant Forsythe announced that he played the violin, and offered to assist in the orchestral parts. Margaret really could think of no reason to decline this offer, but she was sadly upset by the whole thing. His manner to her was too effusive, and she felt continually uncomfortable under it, what with Rosa Rogers's jealous eyes upon her, and Gardley's eyes turned haughtily away.

She planned a number of special rehearsals in the evenings when it was difficult for the lieutenant to get there, and managed in this way to avoid his presence, but the whole matter became a source of much vexation, and Margaret even shed a few tears wearily into her pillow one night when things had gone particularly hard, and Forsythe had hurt the feelings of the Fiddling Boss with his insolent directions about playing. She could not say or do anything much in the matter, because the people at the Fort had been very kind in helping to get the piano, and the old captain seemed to think he was doing the greatest possible kindness to her in letting Forsythe off duty so much to help with the play.

THE first Sunday after the arrival of the piano was a great day. Everybody in the neighborhood turned out to Sunday afternoon class and vesper service, which had been growing more and more in popularity, until now the schoolroom was crowded. Every man from the bunk house came regularly, often including Pop Wallis, who had not yet recovered fully from the effect of his wife's new bonnet and fluffy arrangement of hair, but treated her like a lady visitor, and deferred to her absolutely when he was at home. He wasn't quite sure even yet that he had not strayed by mistake into the outermost courts of heaven and ought to be shooed out. He always looked at the rose-wreathed curtains with a mingling of pride and awe.

Margaret had put several hymns on the blackboard in clear bold printing, and the singing that day was wonderful. Not the least part of the service was her own playing over of the hymns before the singing began, which was listened to with reverence as if it had been the music of an angel playing on a heavenly harp.

Gardley always came to the Sunday services, and helped her with the singing, and often they two sang duets.

The service was not always of set form. Usually Margaret taught a short Bible lesson, beginning with the general outline of the Bible, its books, their form, substance, authors, etc., all very brief and exceedingly simple, putting a wide space of music between this and the vesper service, into which she wove songs, bits of poems, passages from the Bible, and often a story which she told dramatically, illustrating the Scripture read.

But the very Sunday before the play, just the time Margaret had looked forward to as being her rest from all the perplexities of the week, the company from the Fort arrived at the schoolhouse right in the midst of the Bible lesson. The captain's wife was daintily dressed and settled her frills and ribbons amusedly as she watched the embarrassed young teacher trying to forget that there was company present. They were in a distinct sense "company," for they had the air as they entered of having come to look on and be amused, not of having come to partake in the worship with the rest.

Margaret found herself trembling inwardly as she saw the supercilious smile on the lips of the captain's wife, and the amused stares of the other ladies of the party. They did not take any notice of the other people present any more than if they had been so many puppets set up to show off their teacher. Their air of superiority was offensive. Not until Rosa Rogers entered with her father a little later did they condescend to bow in recognition, and then with that pretty little atmosphere as if they would say, "Oh, you've come too, to be amused."

Gardley was sitting up in front listening to her, and she thought he had not noticed the strangers. Suddenly the suggestion came to try to keep her nerve and let Gardley see that the guests were nothing to her; and with a strong effort and a swift prayer for help she called for a hymn. She sat coolly down at the piano, touching the keys with a tender chord or two, and beginning to sing almost at once. She had sent home for some old hymn books from the Christian Endeavor in her father's church, so the congregation were supplied with the notes and words now, and everybody took part eagerly, even the people from the Fort condescending to join in.

But Gardley was too much alive to every expression on that vivid face of Margaret's to miss knowing that she was annoyed and upset. He did not need to turn and look back to discover the cause. He was a young person of keen intuition. It suddenly gave him great satisfaction to see that look of consternation on Margaret's face. It settled for him a question he had been in great and anxious doubt about. When presently according to arrangement he rose to sing a duet with Margaret, no one could possibly have told by so much as the lifting of an eyelash that he knew there was an enemy of his in the back of the room. He sang, as did Margaret, to the immediate audience in front of him, those admiring children and adoring men in the forefront who felt the schoolhouse had become for them the gate of heaven; and he sang with marvelous feeling and sympathy.

"Really," said the captain's wife in a loud whisper to the wife of the second officer, "that young man has a fine voice, and he isn't bad looking either. I think he'd be worth cultivating. We must have him up and try him out."

But when she repeated this remark in another stage whisper to Forsythe he frowned haughtily.

The one glimpse Margaret caught of Forsythe during that afternoon's service was when he was smiling at Rosa Rogers, and she had resolutely to put the memory of their look from her mind or the story which she was about to tell would have fled.

IT was the hunger in Jasper Kemp's eyes that finally anchored Margaret's thoughts and helped her to forget the company at the back of the room. She told her story, told it wonderfully and with power, interpreting it now and then for the row of men who sat in the center of the room drinking in her every word; and when the simple service was concluded with another song in which Gardley's voice rang forth with peculiar tenderness and strength, the men filed forth silently, solemnly, with bowed heads and thoughtful eyes. But the company from the Fort flowed up around Margaret like floodtide let loose, and gushed upon her.

"Oh, my dear!" said the captain's wife, "how beautifully you do it! And such attention as they give you! No wonder you are willing to forego all other amusements to stay here and preach. But it was perfectly sweet the way you made them listen, and the way you told that story. I don't see how you do it. I'd be scared to death!"

They babbled about her much to her annoyance, for there were several people to whom she had wanted to speak, who drew away and disappeared when the newcomers took possession of her. At last, however, they mounted and rode away, to her great relief. Forsythe, it is true, tried to make her go home with them, tried to escort her to the Tanners', tried to remain in the schoolhouse with her awhile when she told him she had something to do there; but she would not let him, and he rode away half sulky at the last, a look of injured pride upon his face.

Margaret went to the door finally, and looked down the road. He was gone, and she was alone. A shade of sadness came over her face. She was sorry that Gardley had not waited. She had wanted to tell him how much she liked his singing, what a pleasure it was to sing with him, and how glad she was that he came up to her need so well with the strangers there, and helped to make it easy. But Gardley had melted away as soon as the service was over, and had probably gone home with the rest of the men. It was disappointing, for she had come to consider their little time together on Sunday as a very pleasant hour.

She turned, and there he was—quite near the door, coming toward her. Her face lighted up with a joy that was unmistakable, and his own smile in answer was a revelation of his deeper self.

"Oh, I'm so glad you are not gone!" she said eagerly. "I wanted to tell you—" and then she stopped, and the color flooded her face rosily, for she saw in his eyes how glad he was, and forgot to finish her sentence.

HE came up gravely, and standing just a moment beside the door, took both her hands in both his. It was only for a second that he stood so, looking down into her eyes.

It was all very decorous, and over in a second, but it meant much to remember afterward, that look and handclasp.

"I wanted to tell you," he said tenderly, "how much that story did for me. It was wonderful, and it helped me to decide something I have been perplexed over."

"Oh, I am glad!" she said half breathlessly.

So, talking in low, broken sentences, they went back to the piano and tried over several songs for the next Sunday, lingering together, just happy to be there and with each other. As the purple lights on the schoolroom wall grew long and rose-edged, they walked slowly to the Tanner house and said good night.

There was a beauty about the young man as he stood for a moment looking down upon the girl in parting, the kind of beauty there is in any strong wild thing made tame and tender for a great love by a great uplift. Gardley had that look of self-surrender, and power made subservient to right, that crowns a man with strength and more than physical beauty. In his fine face there glowed high purpose, and deep devotion to the one who had taught it to him. Margaret, looking up at him, felt her heart go out with that great love, half human, half divine, that comes to some favored women even here on earth, and she watched him down the road toward the mountain in the evening light and marveled and reflected that she had not told her mother and father much about him yet. It was coming time to do so; yes, it was coming time! Her cheeks grew pink in the darkness, and she turned and fled to her room.

That was the last time she saw him before the play.

CHAPTER XXIII

THE play was set for Tuesday. Monday afternoon and evening were to be the final rehearsals, but Gardley did not come to them. Fiddling Boss came late and said the men had been off all day and had not returned. He himself found it hard to come at all. They had important work on. But there was no word from Gardley.

Margaret was disappointed. Of course they could go on with the rehearsal without him. He had done his part so well. But she missed him and an uneasiness grew in her mind. She had so looked forward to seeing him, and now to have no word! He might at least have sent her a note when he found he could not come.

She hurried everything through as soon as possible, knowing she was weary, and longing to get to her room and rest. Gardley would come and explain tomorrow, probably in the morning on his way to his work.

But the morning came, and still no sign of him. Afternoon came, and he had sent no word. Some of the little things he had promised to do about the setting of the stage would have to remain undone, for it was too late now to do it herself, and there was no one else to call upon.

INTO the midst of her perplexity and anxiety came the news that Jed on his way home had been thrown from his [illegible]or, a young and vicious one he was breaking, and had broken his leg. Jed was to act the part of Nick Bottom that evening, and he did it well! Now what in the world was she to do? If only Gardley would come!

Just at that moment Lieutenant Forsythe arrived.

"Oh, it is you, Mr. Forsythe!" and her tone showed plainly her disappointment. "Haven't you seen Mr. Gardley today? I don't know what I shall do without him."

"I certainly have seen Gardley," said Forsythe, a spice of vindictiveness and satisfaction in his tone. "I saw him not two hours ago drunk as a fish, out at a place called Old Ouida's Cabin, as I was passing. He's in for a regular spree. You'll not see him for several days, I fancy. He's utterly helpless for the present and out of the question. What is there I can do for you? Present your request. It is yours—to the half of my kingdom."

Margaret's heart grew cold as ice and then like fire. Her blood seemed to stop utterly and then to go pounding through her veins in leaps and torrents. Her eyes grew dark, and things swam before her. She reached out to a desk and caught at it for support, and her white face looked at him a moment as if she had not heard. But when in a second she spoke she said quite steadily:

"I thank you, Mr. Forsythe; there is nothing just at present—or, yes, there is, if you wouldn't mind helping Timothy put up those curtains. Now I think I'll go home and rest a few minutes—I am very tired."

It wasn't exactly the job Forsythe coveted, to stay in the schoolhouse and fuss over those curtains, but she bade him do it, then disappeared, and he didn't like the memory of her white face. He hadn't thought she would take it that way. He had expected to have her exclaim with horror and disgust. He watched her out of the door and then turned impatiently to the waiting Timothy.

Margaret went outside to call Bud, who had been sent to gather sage brush for filling in the background, but Bud was already out of sight far on the trail toward the camp, on Forsythe's horse, riding for dear life. Bud had come near to the schoolhouse door with his armful of sage brush just in time to hear Forsythe's flippant speech about Gardley, and to see Margaret's white face. Now he had gone for help!

BUT Margaret did not go home to rest. She did not even get half way home. When she had gone a very short distance outside the schoolhouse she saw some one coming toward her, and in her distress of mind at first she could not tell who it was. Her eyes were blinded with tears, her breath was constricted, and it seemed to her that a demon unseen was gripping her heart. She had not yet taken her bearings to know what she thought. She had only just come dazed from the shock of the lieutenant's words and had not the power to think. Over and over to herself as she walked along she kept repeating the words: "I do not believe it! It is not true!" but her inner consciousness had not had time to analyze her soul and be sure that she believed the words wherewith she was comforting herself.

So now when she saw some one coming she felt the necessity of bringing her telltale face to order, and getting ready to answer whomever she was to meet. As she drew nearer she became suddenly aware that it was Rosa Rogers coming, with her arms full of bundles piled up before her on her pony. Rosa had seen the young officer go by her house and had returned promptly to the schoolhouse on some pretext or other. It would not do to let her go there alone with the young man; Margaret must go back and stay with them. She could not be sure that if she sent Rosa home with orders to rest she would be obeyed. Doubtless the girl would take another way around and return to the school again. There was nothing for it but to go back and stay as long as Rosa did.

Margaret stooped and hastily plucking a great armful of sage brush, turned around and retraced her steps, her heart like lead, her feet suddenly grown heavy. How could she go back and hear them laugh and chatter, and answer all their silly, unnecessary questions? How could she stand it all, with that great weight at her heart?

Making Over Your Society

THE first thing to do is to treat your society very much as you would a dress getting the worse for wear. Place the rejuvenating process in skilful hands. Select a president who allows no new methods to escape her. In her daily reading, let her keep a note-book and pencil at hand and her mission work at the back of her head. When well informed, she is prepared to lay her plans and call on the members to help perfect them. The freshening must begin with the president.

In your meetings, change your preliminaries as you would the trimming on a dress. Do not always begin with a song, the Lord's Prayer in concert, minutes of the last meeting, etc. Change the order of the meeting; share Scripture reading with other members. Allow all to share the benefits. Have prompt attendance, a time to begin, and a time to close; and, like hooks and eyes, buttons and buttonholes on a dress, use them. Have topic and Scripture text on a blackboard or piece of cardboard in a conspicuous place, so there will be no whispering as to where we are and what about. The blackboard is useful in freshening up a society as a pressing board is in freshening a dress.

Press it. Press both dress and society. If people are not inclined to come out, insist on it; no one should consider it conceit for the president to insist on having an audience. The work is the King's, and he requires haste about his business. He will have no laggards in his vineyard. He has no use for unwilling service. Smooth out all wrinkles, all pessimistic testimonies, all complainings, all jealousies, in the society. Press out everything disagreeable. Turn it—be it dress or society. Put out the bright side of your experience. Tell the good news, the hopeful side of your work. Put the worn perplexities on the inside, out of sight of the public meeting; they are fit only for your closet. Start differently.

"You simply must do something for your nerves!"

ORDINARILY they get enough nourishment from the regular diet But the distraction of overwork or worry has exhausted this supply—and now they are starving. They must be fed more of their vital foods particularly phosphorus, as your doctor will tell you.

But Sanatogen is not only a mere means of giving this phosphorus—Sanatogen gives it "in such a form," as Dr. C. W. Saleeby says, "that the nervous system can actually take hold of it." That is why Sanatogen has been so eagerly welcomed by physicians and why so many thousands of them have gladly written letters commending this and others of Sanatogen's unusual virtues.

Dr. E. Persichetti, Physician to the Queen Mother of Italy, writes: "I have used Sanatogen in several cases of neurasthenia and in every case the nervous symptoms were greatly diminished."

Sir Gilbert Parker writes: "Sanatogen is a true food-tonic, feeding the nerves, and giving fresh energy to the overworked body and mind."

If you are still wondering if Sanatogen can actually do this for you, why not do the one thing which can convince you—give Sanatogen a trial?

And with your nerves begging you for help, why not do this soon?

Sanatogen is sold by good druggists, everywhere, in sizes from $1.00 up

Questions and Answers

READER. Iowa. Is it true that we can not come to God in repentance unless he leads us? I was converted when a young girl, and my heart was filled with love for the Lord and for every one But soon I lost this happy feeling. Can a person be a child of God and not have this feeling all the time? Since then I have wandered away from God, but would like to come back and love him as I once did.

It is never necessary to wait for any special "leadings" to come back to God. The very fact that you want to come back shows that he is leading you. And the fact that you are sorry for your sins shows that you are repenting. We make a great mistake in allowing ourselves to be hindered and bothered by rules and recipes and phrases instead of coming straight to God and dealing directly and simply with him. He is nearer you than your closest friend. The reason you do not feel his presence and blessing now as you once did is that you are doubting instead of trusting him. Read the wonderful "comfort chapters" in Isaiah, from the fortieth to the fifty-fifth, especially the fortieth, forty-third, and fifty-fourth. Note particularly Isa. 43: 25, where the assurance of forgiveness comes so abruptly after the sad recital of Israel's sins. God reminds the people of their sins, but hastens at once to assure them of his free and full forgiveness. Begin again to trust God's great kindness, that infinite kindness which was so fully expressed in Calvary. As you trust him you will find yourself conscious of his presence; and as you realize again that he is near you, you will find the old love reawakening in your heart. You ask if one can be a child of God without having this happy feeling. Yes. In times of sickness, or delirium, or perplexity, or the too heavy pressure of work and care upon nerves and brain, we may lose the consciousness of our love for God. But we must not "cast away our confidence." God has not changed. We are saved not by our "feelings," but by his omnipotent love.

A friend of the Christian Herald, Chamois, Mo Why was Saul called Paul soon after his conversion?

A number of explanations have been given. One is that Saul took the name of Paul in deference to his friend, Sergius Paulus, the Roman deputy at Paphos, who had desired to hear the Gospel from the lips of Barnabas and Saul. The change of name is mentioned at the time of this episode (Acts 13: 9). But a far more likely explanation is that Paul took this name because it means "little," desiring in this way to express his humility as a servant of Christ. Converts to Christianity have frequently taken a new name at conversion to signify their desire to break away utterly from the old life, choosing a name that expressed in some way their allegiance to Christ or their determination to lead a new life.

H. M. T., Argyle, N. Y. Why is Peter alone mentioned as having preached a sermon on the day of Pentecost? The account in Acts 2 indicates that many others addressed the crowds.

Evidently at the beginning different believers addressed various groups of spectators. Then Peter drew the attention of the crowd and made a longer and more formal address. This is apt to happen at any great open-air gathering. Also after the main address begins others are apt to address those on the outskirts of the crowd who can not hear the main speaker. This may have happened at Pentecost, but the inference is that the eleven other apostles stood near Peter, keeping silent while he addressed the multitude. At any rate, whatever addresses may have been delivered, Peter's was the most important and had the greatest effect, so it is naturally the one recorded Inquirer, Albany, N Y. The first temperance society in the United States—the pioneer organization of its kind—is said to have been formed in Saratoga County New York, in 1808. There had been earlier movements; the colonies of Massachusetts and Connecticut passed laws in the interest of sobriety as far back as 1639, and the Virginia Colony adopted a prohibitory law in 1676; but the records fail to show any organization of a permanent character until the Saratoga experiment, the members of which pledged themselves not to drink any wine or distilled liquors, nor to offer them to others, under a penalty of twenty-five cents. Actual intoxication cost a member a fine of fifty cents In 1818, in the village of Reynoldsville, near Ithaca, N. Y., there was launched the "Hector-Town Temperance Society," which is still in actual operation, being the oldest existing temperance organization in America, if not in the world. It will celebrate its centennial in 1918.

A. B. T., Minneapolis, Minn "Selah" is a musical term used in the Hebrew Psalter. Its precise meaning is uncertain, but it is thought to have indicated several things, including a pause in the music, a change in meter, a difference in rhythm, a point at which the voices are elevated, or an interlude of silence in the main chorus which is filled in by the Levite singers. Modern musicians are strangely in the dark on the subject.

L. K B., Gloversville, N. Y. The passage to which you refer is Mark 16: 7. The special reference to Peter here is so direct and unexpected that there is good ground for believing that it indicates our Lord's special interest in Peter and his great eagerness to assure him of complete forgiveness

W. M. H., Jonesville. The poem by Harry Kemp, which you forward, is based upon the ancient tradition that Joses the brother of Jesus did not believe in his divine mission and power. There is no positive statement to this effect in the New Testament, but since the other brothers of Jesus later became his followers the inference was that Joses did not. The poem is so beautiful and contains so forceful a lesson that we are glad to reprint some lines from it:

Joses, the brother of Jesus, plodded from day to day,
With never a vision within him to glorify his clay;
Joses, the brother of Jesus, was one with the heavy clod,
But Christ was the soul of rapture, and soared, like a lark, with God.
Joses, the brother of Jesus, was only a worker in wood,
And he never could see the glory that Jesus his brother could.
For he never walked with the prophets in God's great garden of bliss—
And of all the mistakes of the ages, the saddest, methinks, was this:
To have such a brother as Jesus, to speak with him day by day,
And never to catch the vision which glorified his clay.

Mrs. M. M. S., Enterprise, Kan. 1. The seven "deadly sins," as defined by early writers, are: pride, anger, envy, sloth, lust, covetousness and gluttony; and the "seven graces" or virtues are faith, hope, charity, prudence, temperance, chastity and fortitude. 2. We expect to publish shortly in the Christian Herald a number of new hymns and sacred songs, which have been specially written for our readers by leading composers of sacred music.

C. D. L., Wyoming, Pa. The practice of taking oaths is a very ancient one and existed long before the days of Moses. (See Gen. 24: 2, 3, 37; Judges 2: 1; 1 Kings 18: 10; Jer. 5: 7; Amos 8: 14, and many other passages.) The Jewish law did not attempt to regulate the use of the custom, but forbade perjury. Under the Gospel however, swearing is condemned. Jesus did not swear; although he was adjured by the high priest, he simply answered, "Thou hast said it." (Matt. 26: 63-64). The administration of the oath was solely the act of the magistrate. The passage in Matt 5: 34 puts the subject in the right light for Christians to follow.

Mrs A. O. R., Clarksville, Iowa. 1. The passage in Acts 15: 29 relating to the prohibition against eating blood and things strangled, was designed as a concession on the part of the Gentile converts to Jewish feelings. There had been much discussion among the Apostles and others concerning the extent to which the new converts should observe the ancient law (see preceding verses in same chapter), and the problem had to be met with some sort of a compromise fitted to the occasion, and keeping in view the necessity of harmony in principle and action between the Gentile disciples and their Jewish brethren. 2. We cannot answer positively your two remaining questions.

J. M. W., Cumberland, Md. The Apostles Creed is not to be found in the Scriptures. According to some historians of the early church, it was formulated by the apostles after the Ascension, each of the number contributing his portion. No ecclesiastical writer before the fifth century mentions any apostolic assembly to formulate a creed, although it doubtless had grown into existence, practically in its present form, very early in the church's history.

F. K., Ohio. We would advise you to pay no attention to such claims. They are not justified by anything in the Gospel teaching, and are only made by people who would mislead and delude the simple and credulous.

increased activity took place on the stro-Italian front. On Sunday, rch 26, the Austrians drove the lians out of their trenches at Grafen- g, near Gorizia, taking some six hdred Italians in the operation. rd infantry fighting followed for the t couple of days, which developed i a general engagement all a g the Gorizia front, being pticularly severe around the Gorizia blgehead.

n the end, the Italians recaptured a ortion of the Grafenberg trenches, ting a few prisoners, while at the s uggle at the Gorizia bridgehead the Atrians got the upper hand and dve the Italians back; also taking se prisoners. During these days tl rest of the Austro-Italian front w the scene of rather animated a llery fighting, particularly near Ra, but the only infantry fighting o a scale of importance was to the e of Seile, where the result was iecisive. Toward the end of the wk bad weather came on and the fiting slackened.

ON the western front Verdun still remained the center of interest, bt the fighting was mostly confined t the artillery on Sunday, as it was on Srday. This artillery activity was gtest on the front west of the Meuse, picularly between the village of Mancourt and the wood of the same nae, where the French report sus- taed bombardments of their second li positions.

he bombardment was also severe at ne time in the sectors of Esnes and H No. 304 further to the southeast of Malancourt. These artillery ac- tis indicated preliminary preparations by the Germans for the launching of an infantry attack on the points bom- bded. Every foot gained on the Acourt-Esnes lines by the Germans w make the French positions at Mancourt, Bethincourt and the west- er slope of Le Mort Homme hill, more diult to hold. Any considerable g would make these positions un- teble and compel their immediate evuation.

such evacuation could be brought alt by the Germans, it would not o consolidate their positions and shten their lines to the west of the Mse, but would also place them in a ption to begin their drive south from Vquois to the Verdun-Clermont Rail- ro at Aubreville, Parois or Recicourt. Sld this drive begin, however, it is lily to be a long drawn-out affair, as he country between Vanquois and th railroad is well wooded and admir- al adapted for defense.

n the north front, besides the artil- le duels, there was some hand-to- ha fighting in the Cailette wood, to h southeast of Fort Douaumont, in wh the Germans came off victors. Othe eastern front the artillery ac- tiy was not so great as on the other tw fronts.

n Monday, the bombardment grew me intense on the west front of Ver- dn all the important positions, Beth- inrt, Le Mort Homme hill and Chieres, coming in for attention. Fher west almost equal activity was rerted at Cheppy wood, which seems no without significance, for this wood is ated directly to the west of Avo- co and to the southwest of the Bois de Malancourt, which it adjoins, almost ruing into it.

ter a heavy bombardment of the Frch positions on the west front of Vun on Tuesday, the Germans lached a heavy infantry attack on that po on of this line which extends from Hacourt, on the south, to Malancourt, on he north. The distance between th two places is about half a mile, an this distance forms the northern po on of the western side of the French salnt which projects into the German lin to the west of the Meuse, the no ern side being a line drawn from Mancourt to Bethincourt, about one an five-eighths miles long, and the asrn side a line drawn from Bethin- co to the western slope of Le Morte Homme hill, a distance of just under a mile. The French were able to repulse the successive waves of the assault with infantry and artillery fire, and to inflict heavy losses on their assailants, so that the German objective was not realized.

On the northern and eastern fronts, outside of continued bombardments by the Germans of the French second lines, nothing of interest occurred on Wednesday.

It appears to have been give-and-take in the Malancourt-Bethincourt salient west of the Meuse, Thursday, and the western front of the Verdun position saw hot fighting nearly all day. In the morning, the French made a successful attack on the southeastern corner of the Avocourt wood, and drove forward into the German positions for a depth of a little over 300 yards to the west, and captured a field work called the Redoubt of Avocourt, to which they attach importance. The Germans violently counter-attacked, not only soon after the redoubt was captured, but also three times later in the day, but did not succeed in wresting the positions from the hands of the victors of the morning.

North of the village of Malancourt the Germans drove an attack southward through several lines of French trenches, reaching and holding the houses on the northwestern end of the village of Malancourt itself, which forms the northwestern corner of this salient. The French counter-attacked, but, like the Germans in Avocourt wood, without success.

On Friday the infantry fighting on the western front was the most severe in some days, and began with a night attack on Thursday by the Germans on the village of Malancourt, the northwest corner of the Malancourt-Bethincourt salient. The Germans drove the French completely from the village, though they still hold the ground to the south and east thereof. The village is now, quite naturally, a heap of ruins.

From daybreak until the evening this front was reasonably quiet, no further infantry attacks taking place, though the artillery activities continued. Toward evening the Germans began a heavy bombardment of Hill 295 to Le Morte Homme hill, and after this had lasted an hour or so launched a heavy infantry attack on the French positions to the northeast of the hill.

Saturday morning, the Germans made a further gain by capturing the village of Vaux, so much fought over, completely. On the rest of the western front there were no events of any importance, except that about the middle of the week the British gained a local success near St. Eloi by capturing 600 or 700 yards of German trenches, with a few prisoners. Later, a portion of this gain was lost. The French claim to have exacted a fearful price for the ground relinquished in the region of Malancourt.

On the nights of March 31, April 1 and 2, Zeppelins made raids on the English coast in which many persons were reported killed and a larger number injured. One of the Zeppelins was brought down, and one was reported to have been turned back before it reached a point where it could do effective work. According to a passenger who arrived in New York March 29 from London, extensive preparations have been made along the whole coast of England to repel invasion, the southeast and east coasts being protected for miles inland by successive rows of trenches manned with troops. A fleet of naval aeroplanes is constantly in the air day and night scouting for the expected German fleet, and powerful searchlights have been installed all along the coast.

Considerable military activity has been reported from Holland the last week, officers on furlough having been recalled to the colors, the forces of Holland apparently being put in a state of complete readiness. Officials confess utter ignorance of the meaning of these preparations. The Germans have been reported as concentrating forces along the Dutch border.

Blue-jay

Remember this - Corns are Needless

IT'S a pity to suffer corns. Millions of people don't. If a corn appears, they put a Blue-jay on it.

Never a pain after that. In 48 hours the corn disappears, and forever.

Why don't you let Blue-jay prove that?

The way is easy, gentle, quick. It is scientific, and results are inevitable.

One Blue-jay is sufficient on 91 per cent of all corns. On old, stubborn corns simply use another.

Why pare corns and keep them? Why use harsh methods and risk soreness? Or ways that don't end corns?

Apply a Blue-jay and you know the corn will end. Never again will it bother. That is proved a million times a month.

Corns are inexcusable today.

John Nelson, Pharmacist

By LOUIS E. ORCUTT

"I ASSURE you, Mrs. Wainright, that that water bottle is the very purest rubber, fully guaranteed for one year. If you are careful not to pour boiling water into it, and it leaks, even the slightest, you can bring it back and I will give you a new one. The manufacturer stands back of it and it is his guarantee that I am passing on to you. Yes, it holds three pints. Two-quart size? Yes. The price is only fifty cents more. You will take this one? One dollar and a half. Thank you. Yes. I shall be happy to send it right up."

John Nelson, latest addition to the force of the Robinson Pharmacy, had stopped polishing the brass on the showcases to listen, as he had been told to do, to this shining example of retail salesmanship. He wondered if he would ever be able to smile as graciously or rub his hands together as unctuously as the boss. After hours, when he was sweeping out and the shades were drawn, he would practice marching up the center aisle of the store to greet some one of the customers of the day. He got the smile with little difficulty, for his good-natured Scandinavian countenance was built for smiling; but his hands seemed to be cut on too large a pattern for rubbing together. The head clerk approached a customer with his hands pressed together in front of his chest. At the proper distance he would bow gracefully and let his hands and arms drop in a sweeping curve as he said, "Good day, madam; what can I show you?" This caper John found more easy to copy than the other, and he practiced until he felt proficient.

Then one morning the very haughty Mrs. Jones-Mynster entered the store when the boss was preparing a prescription and the head clerk was out to lunch and the other two clerks were busy. John approached her in the first position of the head clerk's bow; but his tongue filled his mouth and refused to perform its proper function of speech, and he was halted in mid-aisle with his hands pressed together before his chest, his toes approaching each other at an angle of 45°, and his face reddening each instant to a deeper shade of scarlet. In vain he tried to open his mouth or to part those beseeching hands. He was petrified and rooted to the spot.

The lady looked him over once, smiled a little, and said coldly, "Young man, can you sell me a stamp?"

"Yaas," said John, and the monosyllable broke the spell; "Ay tank so."

Forgetting all his practiced airs he hurried back of the counter to the little drawer where stamps were kept and passed out a one-cent stamp.

"Oh, but I wanted a two," said Mrs. Jones-Mynster, with an air as of one who has been misunderstood; and John, in his haste to rectify his seeming error, pulled the drawer clear out and spilled the contents on the floor. He rescued one red stamp from the mixture on the floor and passed it across the counter to the waiting customer, who took it somewhat ungraciously and told him to charge it to her account. By the time she had attached the stamp to her letter and had left the store, the other two clerks were at liberty again, and John had the pleasure of observing a series of caricatures of his first attendance upon a customer. These may have helped his education in the mysteries of salesmanship, but they did not greatly minister to his personal comfort, and for the first time in his life John Nelson was grouchy. "Aw," he said, "you fellas bane tink you're smart."

"Yaas. Ay tank so," answered the two tormentors in chorus. Then the older of the two relented and offered a piece of advice.

"You never can sell goods like the boss or like Perkins, Sweedy," said he; "there ain't no use of you copying their motions or ways o' talkin'. If you are a salesman, you are, and the ability to sell goods is down inside o' you somewhere. If you want to get it out, learn all you can about the goods and then tell the customers what you know without any frills or ruffles that don't come natural. You'll strike your pace some day, but till you do, you mustn feel bad if Joe and I have a little fun mi ou. Hey, Joe?"

"Yaas. Ay tank so," answere Joe.

IN spite of this friendly advice, owever, John still felt humiliate and discouraged; and he was still i the dumps when, late in the afternoo fate threw another customer in his ath. This time it was a little wom , a stranger in the store, who ca in quietly and smiled diffidently at oh as she asked him for a package of ell-known cough remedy.

John had not needed to practic an manner of approach with this ustomer, for she had approached im he had not needed to ask wha she wanted, for she had made her an known. There was something abo her that put him at his ease. He fou th remedy on the shelves, and true irstructions he took down the larg size as he turned to ask her which si sh desired. She took the size offere and then John, with a fluency tha su prised himself, without once l sing from the English he had learn in school, asked her if there was an hing else.

There was. She wanted to kno ow they kept the metal on the show as so bright.

It may have been a passing th ght with the customer, but it gave Jc an opportunity to demonstrate one the few things about which he ha full information. He said: "Just a m ut and I'll show you." Joe insisted teward that John had said "Yc t a minute," but in the flush of v or over his first sale, John refused l teased.

John brought his can of polish a his rags and chamois and proceed to demonstrate, for the customer, er step in the polishing process, expl ing meanwhile that the polish was m e of whiting and alcohol. He applie the polish to a slightly tarnished ner, permitted it to dry, rubbed it off h a linty rag and then polished it vigo sly with the chamois. The custome wa interested. She wanted to kno ju how much whiting and alcohol t use. and John, who had mixed that er canful, could tell her. Then she w ted to know how much of each she ul need to buy, and finally John wr p up a nickel's worth of whiting and half pint of alcohol and rang up his tot sale with such a vigorous turn of the a that the money in the drawer of th ash register was almost thrown out l the sudden action of the machine.

THE graces of the boss and th ead clerk were not thereafter a p t of John's equipment. This first cus mer had awakened the latent salesm in the boy, and he forgot all about h self in his eagerness for sales. He l ned rapidly, and the boss was not un are of his growing knowledge or un ling to reward it. When, three years ter, John came back from the exami tion at the state capital with a regi ered pharmacist's license in his pocket ven Joe was moved to address him w respect. "Sweedy" was no longer propriate, nor could Joe bring him f to banter a man who had done in ree years what he had failed to do i ive. In fact, happy-go-lucky Joe s ned sobered by John's success.

A few months later the morning per in the little city announced tha Silas Perkins, who had for eight year een connected with the Fraser Drug ompany, would on June 1 open a ne rug store at the corner of Main and ams Streets, and another item told th eople that Mr. John Nelson would o lay 1 succeed Mr. Silas Perkins as pr ription clerk at the Fraser Pharmacy Joe read the notice in silence, then he ook his head sadly and said, "Yaas, A ank so."

The girl with the clear skin wins

Many an otherwise attractive girl is a social failure because of a poor complexion. If your skin is not fresh, smooth and healthy, or has suffered from an unwise use of cosmetics, see if the daily use of Resinol Soap will not greatly improve it.

Resinol Soap is not only unusually cleansing and softening, but its regular use helps nature give to the skin and hair that beauty of perfect health which it is impossible to imitate. Tendency to pimples is lessened, redness and roughness disappear, and in a very short time the complexion usually becomes clear, fresh, and velvety.

The soothing, restoring influence that makes this possible is the Resinol which this soap contains and which physicians have prescribed for over twenty years, in Resinol Ointment, for skin and scalp troubles.

This same gentle medication, together with its freedom from harsh, irritating alkali, adapt Resinol Soap admirably to the care of the hair and of a baby's delicate skin.

If the skin is in really bad condition through neglect or improper treatment, Resinol Soap should at first be aided by a little Resinol Ointment.

Resinol Soap is sold by all druggists and dealers in toilet goods. In trial-size cake, write to Dept. 6-K, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

"What! My Car?"

"Yes! Skidded—and it's up to you. You failed to provide the chauffeur with Tire Chains. Only good luck saved your wife from paying the supreme penalty for your negligence. She's on the way to the hospital, painfully injured, but the doctor thinks she'll pull through. You'd better hurry to the hospital and then report to Headquarters".

How strange it is that disaster must come to some men before they realize that all makes and types of tires will skid on wet pavements and muddy roads when not equipped with Chains.

These men do not appreciate, until too late, that by failing to provide Weed Anti-Skid Chains they expose their families to injury and death.

The time to provide against accidents is before they happen. Don't wait until after the first skid. Put Weed Chains on all four tires at the first indication of slippery going and you will have quadruple protection against injury, death, car damage and law suits.

HANDY HUSBAND

Knew How to Get Part of the Breakfast.

"'I know one dish I can prepare for breakfast as well as any cook on earth,' said my husband one morning when the cook was ill and he had volunteered to help get breakfast. He appeared with his dish and I discovered it was Grape-Nuts which, of course, was easy to prepare for it was perfectly cooked at the factory, but it was a good illustration of the convenience of having Grape-Nuts about.

"We took up Grape-Nuts immediately after returning from a five years' sojourn in a hot country. Our stomachs were in bad condition and we were in poor health generally.

"In a day or two we liked Grape-Nuts better than any other kind of food on the table. We both gained steadily in health and strength, and this was caused by Grape-Nuts and Postum.

"A friend of ours had a similar experience. She was seriously ill with indigestion and could find nothing to eat that would not give her heartburn and palpitation, especially at night.

"She found that a small dish of Grape-Nuts with cream made her a satisfactory supper and gave her a comfortable night's rest. In a short time she gained several pounds in weight."

"There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Church Comity in Montana

AN example of what can be done to the mutual advantage of each church and the Kingdom at large is shown in the history of the churches in northeastern Montana, in what is now Sheridan County. The Presbyterians were first in the field, occupying the towns along the Missouri River, on the then new line of the Great Northern Railway. Some years later a branch line was built north, tapping the rich bench land along the North Dakota border. The Congregationalists had men available, and they manned this field. Soon after, the Methodists passed over these promising towns and located in the "regions beyond," where there were but a few post offices and a country store or two. Three years ago two lines of railway were run through this fine farming land along the Canadian border. The Methodists are now rejoicing in a number of growing churches that are keeping pace with the rapidly growing towns.

The Congregationalists in the meantime reached out to the new towns along the new lines near to their older churches, while the Presbyterians pushed their outposts far into the Indian reservation that occupied the south half of the county. Now that the reservation has been opened up for settlement, another opportunity opens up before the allies of the Kingdom They are throwing their forces across the border from every side, each from over against their own house, as with Nehemiah of old. Recently the Lutherans, German Evangelical and Danish Baptist churches have entered the field. Thus, with the utmost cordiality, the waste places have been parceled out. Highways are being leveled and rough places made smooth, for the auto is abroad in the land.

Golden Weddings

ON January 17, 1916, Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Ebersol of Ottawa, Ill., celebrated their golden wedding anniversary. Mr. Ebersol was one of the "Boys in Blue" of the sixties and he knows what war means. He writes: "I am for Prohibition and against Preparedness." Mr. Ebersol's sister wrote some verses for the event, of which we gladly publish four, for it is worth while so to live fifty years that folks may dare to speak thus of you:

For fifty years, through thick and thin,
You've taken time each day
To gather round the altar
To read and sing and pray.

You've been a blessing to the church,
A blessing to your neighbor;
You've given in an hour of need
Your time and thought and labor.

You've always tried to do your best
To make this old world brighter,
To plant a flower, to sing a song,
To make some sad heart lighter.

Now stay until the roses bloom
And skies are blue above you;
We'll plan to come in one by one
And tell you how we love you.

EIGHT years ago the Christian Herald had the pleasure of chronicling the golden wedding anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. Vincent J. Pappi of New York City, who had then been many years subscribers of the Christian Herald. On March 12 of this year, Mr. and Mrs. Pappi celebrated their fifty-eighth anniversary and, as in the previous case, the family circle was unbroken, all five children and all of the grandchildren being present. Mr. and Mrs. Pappi are members of the Scotch Presbyterian Church, and are still vitally interested in all of its activities

MR. and Mrs. W. I. Mackey of Altoona, Pa., two long-time friends of the Christian Herald, celebrated the golden anniversary of their marriage on Saturday evening, March 4. In the family gathering were twenty grandchildren and one great granddaughter.

Christian Herald Prayer League

All Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League. All correspondents are specially requested to make their letters as brief as possible. Write requests and acknowledgments on separate sheets.

A VIRGINIA Mother writes: "I asked your prayers that my eldest son might be cured of the liquor habit. He is cured. For some months he has been entirely free." Mrs. R. M. writes: "I want to acknowledge an answer to your prayers. My nephew and his family are united." Mrs. A. E. K. writes from Glasgow, Ky.: "Four weeks ago I asked prayer for the recovery of my sister, who was desperately ill. I wish to thank God that he heard and answered that prayer. My sister is now sitting up, and improving each day." Q. M. writes from Brooklyn, N. Y.: "The man for whom I asked special prayer last week for loss of speech regained it last Monday sufficiently to be understood. But he is still in a very nervous state; please continue to pray for him."

H. P. writes: "I wish to acknowledge God's signal answer to my prayers on different occasions; twice in my recovery from extreme illness, and recently in the reconciliation of an estranged relative."

M. B. C. writes: "About a month ago I asked prayer for my husband, who was drinking, and I believe the prayer was answered, as he never touches it now and says he will not." This wife asks prayer for healing of herself and daughter from a distressing disease.

A Pennsylvania lady writes to say that prayers for her grandson were answered and to ask prayer that a difficulty in his Sunday school life, which has resulted in his leaving Sunday school and church, may be overcome and that he may return to his place.

Another writes: "More than one of my requests of last year were answered. Not that my faith is placed in the Prayer League, but in our Father, to whom each of us is looking, that I am coming again to ask the members to join in prayer for the complete victory over the drink habit for a loved one. Also that a daughter may be spiritually blessed."

H. M., Fort Madison, Iowa, writes: "Some two years ago I asked your prayers that a dreadful disease might be averted. The Lord answered, and He has given me faith to trust him that He will continue to be. Now I ask your earnest prayers for a dear friend that his mind may be fully restored, his faith strengthened, and that his family may all become earnest Christians."

A letter comes from Miss Eva Van Arsdale, a missionary in India: "I would like to ask the prayers of the Prayer League that God will supply the funds for rebuilding our mission home that was ruined by flood, also for the help of the Holy Spirit in our Hindu girls' school until our house is rebuilt."

A Mother writes from Winnsboro, La.: "God has often mercifully answered my prayers, and I am trusting him to hear our prayers now. My son is very ill in a sanatorium. Will you please pray for his conversion and complete recovery? My daughter is also ill. Pray that her health may be restored. They are all I have." A chaplain writes: "I have a desire to enter the Prayer League, asking prayers of the good people that I may accomplish still greater work as chaplain of our county jail and work house. There are so many young men who are sent here to serve time that are not bad, but were only started wrong in life. I have many testimonials of men who are going to live better lives."

Automobiles and Insurance

Most people think of automobile insurance as an old form of protection adapted to a modern invention. As a matter of fact, the self-propelled vehicle is older than most forms of insurance. A Frenchman drove a steam carriage in the days of Marie Antoinette. An Englishman was arrested for joy-riding in 1802. In 1815 the directors of the Hartford Fire Insurance Company were amazed to see a steam locomotive snorting through the streets. We are not told whether they ever considered this strange contraption from an insurance standpoint. But we do know that almost before the motor car had ceased to be an experiment the Hartford Fire Insurance Company was offering automobile policies. Today you can insure yourself from every risk of a motor car through the complete

Easter Lesson—The Risen Christ

International Sunday School Lesson for April 23
I Cor. 15 : 1-28

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"Now hath Christ been raised from the dead, the first fruits of them that are asleep." 1 Cor. 15: 20.

Bunyan tells the story of the resurrection in his inimitable manner, thus: It is a conversation between the terrible Captain Sepulcher and his standard-bearer, Corruption, on the night that Jesus Christ was buried. Sepulcher says to Corruption, "Hold fast to that man in Joseph's tomb yonder! There is a rumor that he proposes to break from the grave: do not let him go." But Corruption fails to touch him during all those hours in the tomb, because it had been written, "Thou wilt not suffer thy Holy One to see Corruption." Then Hell from beneath cries out, "Hold fast that man. If he comes out he will make a breach in the walls of death, through which all the prisoners of Hades will escape." And he that hath the power of death, the devil, exclaims in fright, "If thou let this man go, thou not Satan's friend." But vain the the watch, the grip of death. As it gan to dawn on the first day of the w a mighty stir began in the tomb. Ca Sepulcher tightens his grip in vain. was not possible that the Prince of should be holden by death.

On the morning of this great ev the priest in the temple was waving first sheaf of the new harvest, and in senting it to God he practically prese the entire yield of the year. You c judge of the whole by that one offe Thus the risen Christ is not only the pl of our resurrection, but the pattern of power. We shall be like him, by power wherewith he is able to subdu things to himself.

The Deathless Christ

By Arthur H. Howland

PAUL was a practical man. Sometimes that phrase has a bad flavor, suggesting that a man may be so practical as to be willing upon occasion to sacrifice worthy ideals. Paul was an idealist in the sense that he never let down his standards, never ceased to believe in and to stand for the best things. But he was also practical. He lived as a vital, busy factor of the real life of his day. He worked with his own hands as a tent-maker; he was familiar with athletics; with business, and politics, and, unfortunately, warfare. He knew the parts of a ship; he was acquainted with government officials; he knew Jewish law and history; he understood the experiences and failures and hopes of ordinary men and women; he had matter-of-fact friends. His letters have been found to be so full of practical wisdom that they have stood the tests of time and change and are still recognized as among the most valuable documents in the world.

Yet this same practical man, Paul, right in the midst of a practical common-sense letter, giving practical advice to practical people about practical affairs, declares that he knows positively that a certain man came back to the world after he had died. He declares that certain intimate friends of his saw this man alive again after he had been put to death. He declares that other groups of people, known to those friends, saw him too. Finally he declares in the most positive and matter-of-fact way that he himself had one time seen this man who had come back from death.

If Paul had been writing the message of this fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians to a church in New York in the twentieth century instead of to a church in Corinth in the first century, he would have put it something like this:

> Now you all know me, and you know that I am proud to speak of myself always as the slave of Jesus Christ. You all know, as I know, that this Jesus died and was buried. You also know that after he had died, my friend Simon Peter saw him alive. Then five hundred people saw him at once. Some of them are alive yet. After that my friend James saw him. Then the other nine apostles saw him. Then I saw him myself. It seems strange that I was privileged to see him, for I am not worthy to be classed as one of his apostles, because I used to persecute the church of God. But God's grace came to me and changed me, and helped me to do even more work than the rest of them. But remember, it was not I who did the work, but God, who gave me his grace and help. But it doesn't make any difference whether it was I or they who present the witness. This is what we preach, and this is what we believe. Now since you know that Jesus rose from the dead, why are some of you saying that there is no such thing as a resurrection from the dead? Do you not see that such doubts as this will put you right back in the dark and under the old power of your sin? If you begin to think that there is no resurrection for the rest of us, you will soon begin to think that we are not telling you the truth when we say that Jesus came back from death. Why not accept all this testimony which you know to be true, and believe that Jesus not only tri phed over death but that the rest of us will umph with him?
> Adam sinned and we have all yield o his influence and example, and sinned t Because there is world-wide sin, there i orld-wide death. But Christ has conquer both sin and death. And those that follow h shall live with him always. You say this is rd to understand. Well, isn't it hard to und stand how a cold, apparently dead grain o heat, put into the dark ground, comes up in in new and manifold life? Wheat that uried brings forth wheat. There are many ms of life and existence—men and beasts l fish and birds. There are heavenly existen s and earthly existences. Some existences h more splendor than others.

But who can hope to mak more vivid and modern Paul's words e?

> So also is the resurrection of the d l. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in i rruption. It is sown in dishonor; it is ed in glory. It is sown in weakness; it is ed in power. It is sown a natural body; it aised a spiritual body. As we have borne t mage of the earthly we shall also bear the ge of the heavenly.

Then he exults:

> Death? Death is swallowed up in tory. Death has lost its sting. The grave s lost its victory. The sting of death is sin, God has given us the victory over sin by t power of Jesus. And because we have vict over sin, we shall have victory over deat And now because you know these thin dear brothers and sisters, be steady, n aken doing every day more and more k fo Christ. Your work will stand, God w estab lish it, death cannot put an end to it.

This is Paul's message about eath. It satisfies the mind as well as th eart. It nerves us for our work. It l ps us to bear the loss of dear ones. I takes away our fear of the time when , too must die.

Have the class look up and scus the various appearances of Jes after his resurrection.

Have the members of the clas elat any experiences they may ha had which have led them to be sure th their dead friends are still alive, and t they shall see them again.

Expand the argument Paul line from nature. Picture again the racle of the grains and the grasses, t trees and the flowers springing into li after winter's darkness and cold.

Emphasize and analyze the ation between salvation from sin and s ation from death. Study particula th sixth chapter of Romans. Paul clare that our faith joins us with Chris on his cross. As he died there, so we nke with him, die to the old life "Old things have passed awa things have become new." As S l, blasphemer and persecutor, came Paul, the apostle and martyr, sever believer may die to the old life l live a new spiritual life in the powe of the risen Jesus. "I am crucifie wi Christ," Paul wrote, "nevert ess live. Yet not I, but Christ liveth n me And the life I now live in the esh live by the faith of the Son of G wh loved me and gave himself for m

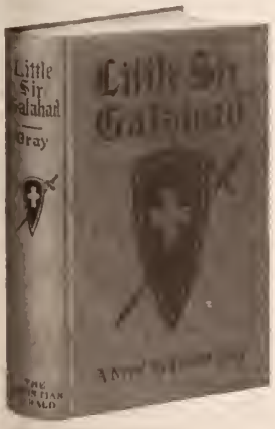
'e do not know when we have had quite as uch pleasure in reading any book this ye as "Little Sir Galahad." There is so mu that is charming and humorous and int sely human in the whole story that it ap ls to the reader probably with greater for than if the action were on a more dig fied level.



'ittle Sir Galahad" is really a story of the lden age in our own time. That beau- tif season that makes life radiant while it l s.

THE IRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York, N. Y.

Emphasize the fact that spiritual changes and achievements are matters not of artificial effort, but of genuine life. It is sad to think how much human energy is wasted in efforts to love God, to overcome evil, to find peace in the matter of former transgressions, to have spiritual power for helping others. A heart spiritually dead can not produce these results. What is needed is life, new life, the life which was in Jesus, the life which showed on the first Easter Sunday that it was stronger than death and sin.

This is a beautiful time for talking about the "fruits of the Spirit." How do all these things come—love and joy and peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness? They come just as the fruits and flowers come to plants and vines and trees. By the pulsating power of life. It is just as foolish to try to produce fruitage of peace and joy and holy love on a sinful heart as it would be to tie lilies, peaches, apples, bunches of grapes, on dead trees and vines. There must be life to produce these things. So must the soul have life to produce the fruits of the Spirit. Jesus came that we might have life, and have it more abundantly.

Emphasize especially Paul's striking union of faith in the resurrection with fidelity in our work. Because we serve a risen Saviour, because we shall meet him at the end of an earthly task, because, although death seems to be the strongest thing in the world, it has no power to ovethrow the work and the influence of a holy man, because of these things we are exhorted to be "steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord."

Make the Easter lesson the time for sharpening and strengthening the teachings about unselfishness. Our joy in Easter should not be a selfish joy. We should be glad, not chiefly because we shall live again, nor that we shall see our friends again, but that Easter gives us the right to declare a message of hope to all the world. Christ's Easter blessing gives us not only victory over sin and death, but power to lead others to holiness, to love, to God, to immortality.

This is a sad Easter. Death is reigning. Hate is reigning. Sin and grief are reigning. But above all these kings of darkness, there actually reigns a higher King. Death can not defeat him; sin can not overthrow him: hatred and wars can not drive him from the race of men whom he died to save. May next Easter find a world at rest from war and a church more than ever alive to its task of wrenching men from the powers of sin and fear and hate to the blessings of righteousness and hope and love, the task of compelling civilization to conform itself to the requirements and precepts of the deathless Christ!

THE Shinshu Sect, the strongest Buddhist body in Japan, is going to spend millions of yen to start thousands of Sunday schools in its temples throughout the empire, in commemoration of the emperor's coronation. This is one of many methods of promoting their work which the Buddhists in Japan have learned of the Christians. At an important conference in Tokyo, at the home of Count Okuma, prime minister, when it was suggested that in view of the Tokyo convention the Christian Sunday schools of Japan be encouraged, several leaders stated that because of Buddhist influence the public schools were discouraging the Sunday schools throughout Japan. Steps were taken at once to correct this condition.

FOLLOWING the recent Congress on Christian Work in Latin America, at Panama a group of the delegates, who are especially interested in Sunday school work, attended the regional conferences at Lima, Santiago Buenos Aires, Montevideo and Rio de Janeiro.

A Great National Public Utility

That concerns all merchants and all people

THE original Cash Register rang a bell, indicated and recorded the amount of the purchase. It benefited the merchant only.

In a third of a century this old model has developed into a Cash Register that directly benefits every man, woman and child who spends money in a store.

This new Cash Register equally concerns every merchant and clerk, every banker and wholesaler in this land.

It furnishes every customer with a receipt or sales slip.

It prints on this the amount paid or charged.

On this is also printed the date of the sale and who made it.

It forces a duplicate printed record for the merchant.

It prevents disputes over charges and bills paid.

It saves shoppers' time.

It gives the merchant all his profits. It gives him more money for his family.

It promotes more and quicker sales.

It protects each clerk against making errors and against the mistakes of others.

It rewards the diligent clerk by telling his employer which one makes the largest number of sales and which one gets the greatest amount of business.

It assures the banker additional security for the money he loans the merchant.

It gives the wholesaler additional assurance that the merchant will have money to pay his bills.

It furnishes the banker and the wholesaler mechanical evidence that the merchant's statement of his business is correct.

Answers to Bible Contest Inquiries

Question. I have given up the Bible Picture Contest. Would it be all right if I would transfer my Outfit to my sister? We are in one family under one roof.—G. H. R., Shiremanstown, Pa.

Answer: There is nothing to prevent your transferring your materials to your sister, and aiding her throughout the Contest. You must remember, though, that answers are to be submitted in the name of the person who worked them out.

Question: In case one has the best right answer for each picture, will he receive any more credit for several right answers than just one for each?—Mrs. T. A. L., Shawneetown, Ill.

Answer: We judge from your question of recent date regarding the Bible Picture Contest that you are undecided whether to submit one verse for each picture, or several. That is for each contestant to decide. Some contestants may wish to submit many answers, feeling that in doing so they are submitting the fullest result of their shrewd search through the list of verses, while others may decide to confine their answers to one for each picture, hoping in each case to submit the best verse.

In this connection it may be wise to consider that the Judges may name more than one best verse for a picture. They may be unable to choose between two or more verses submitted for a picture, and may say that the verses fit the picture equally well, and that they are all best verses for that picture. Then the contestant submitting only one verse for the picture could not possibly receive credit for more than one best verse, for that would be all he submitted.

Question: May any verse of Scripture given in "Gems from the Bible," and illustrating the lesson taught by the picture to which it is applied, be given as one of the five answers allowed? This opens a much wider field to select from than a mere dead, literal application to the picture would allow. If not, it would seem that the sample case given in the Reply Book for the guidance of competitors is merely misleading; and in any case it is hard to see the relevancy of one or two of the verses quoted to the picture given. In fact, it appears to me that according to the rules laid down such answers would count against a contestant rather than in his favor.

The second point I want cleared up has reference to the order in which the texts are to be given The text which most fully answers the picture may be one of several recording an episode in Scripture history. By the rule laid down this text should be given the first place; but other verses preceding it may also, though in a less degree, be applicable. In such a case, should the natural order of the narrative be observed, or the degree of conformity to the picture take precedence?—C. W. M., New York City

Answer: You may submit verses that in your opinion apply to the significance of a picture, or illustrate the moral lesson taught. Of course all verses submitted as answers must pass the scrutiny of the Judges, who will name the best answers for the pictures, and we, nor any one, can tell which verses the Judges will select. But there is no limitation as to kind of verses contestants may submit; the only limitation is to the verses which are reproduced in the "Gems." And not more than five verses may be submitted to any picture.

Probably the object lesson verses given in the Reply Book were unfortunately chosen. The idea there was simply to show contestants how they could write as many as five verses on a page of the Reply Book, and the verses were not selected with any special attention to their application to the picture.

Irrespective of the continuity of verses, you should submit verses in the order of their degree of applicability to a picture. The text which in your opinion is the most fitting title for the picture should be submitted first; and the verses fitting the pictures to a lesser degree should follow according to their applicability.

Question: Several have raised the question about the amount of money received in case of a tie. I have referred them to your statement or rule No. 10 in the Reply Book, but they say you declare that only so much money will be given in prizes, and so they still think it will have to be divided. Am I not right in saying that whether a tie occurs in the highest or lowest prize, the full amount offered is won by each tying participant?

One more question, please: Is it not only in families that two can work together? So I understand, but again one raises the question whether two not in the family can work together.—M. D. B., Marshall, Texas.

Answer: In case of final ties for any reward, the full reward tied for will be paid each tying contestant. There will be no departure from this rule, no matter what the reward tied for.

Two or more people not in the same family may work together if they desire. There is no specific restriction upon this point. Also a whole family may combine upon submitting one set of answers, or each member of the family may submit a separate set—or as many as three sets each.

Correspondence of Professor David Smith, D.D.

"I have been brought up in such a way that going to church has become a natural habit with me, and I feel that I should never want to stay away. But a friend of mine has got another idea. He says that he can be just as good at home as at church. He points out that there are heaps of people who never go to church, and yet they are most Christianlike, more so in some cases than a lot of people who do go. I may say that my friend is a thoroughly honest, upright, kind, clean-minded fellow, in spite of his non-churchgoing."—A. D.

IT is evident that you have enjoyed two precious privileges: an upbringing in a home where Christianity is no mere profession, but a gracious reality, an atmosphere of love and peace, and an attractive and helpful ministry—else you would not have such a liking for churchgoing. Had your friend's experience been similar to yours he would have felt as you do. It seems to me that your experience is a sufficient answer to your question. You remember the exhortation in the Epistle to the Hebrews (10:25, R.V.) against "forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the custom of some is." It is interesting to notice, by the way, the contrast between the "custom" of these defaulters and the "custom" of our Lord: "He entered, as his custom was, into the synagogue on the Sabbath Day" (Luke 4:16). His custom is our example, and in this particular it invalidates at least one common excuse. The Jewish theology was dead and the preaching dreary; yet our Lord attended. This, however, is not the idea I wish to put before you. It lies in that phrase, "the assembling of ourselves together." The Greek noun so rendered occurs in only one other passage in the New Testament, namely, II Thess. 2:1: "The coming of our Lord Jesus Christ and our gathering together unto him." It is the same word in both instances—"the gathering of ourselves together" each Lord's Day in the house of prayer, and "our gathering together unto him" when he "comes again to receive us unto himself, that where he is, there we may be also" (John 14:3). The noun occurs only in these two passages, but the corresponding verb is more frequent, and two of its occurrences are significant in this connection. One is Matt. 23:37—"How often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings!" and the other Mark 13:27: "Then shall he . . . gather together his elect from the four winds." Here is a beautiful and alluring idea of churchgoing. The "custom" has a double use. (1) It means "the gathering of ourselves together" to the Lord Jesus Christ, with the story of our common need and sin and sorrow, and receiving his love and grace and peace into our troubled hearts. Of course, worship is not limited to "temples made with hands," but if it be alleged that one may meet with God on a hillside of a Sunday, I would ask what God it is that one meets there. It is the God of Nature, glorious and majestic, not the pitiful and merciful Father revealed in the cross of our Blessed Redeemer. And this is the God that poor sinners need. (2) When we "gather ourselves together" in the house of prayer, our thoughts reach out to the final consummation, the glad home-gathering. And this is the supreme benediction of churchgoing, needed always, but especially in these days when there are so many homes in the world touched by the sorrow of the war. Thank God for the house of prayer, where we meet with the Saviour, and not only commit our dear ones into his faithful keeping, but console ourselves with his promise of a glad reunion in our Father's house. If this be churchgoing, who would stay away? God grant his Holy Spirit to our ministers that they may exhibit the Living Saviour in his grace and tenderness, and the churchgoing will be a blessed privilege, and none will miss it.

DAVID SMITH.

New Bible Picture Contest Offer

To All Subscribers to The Christian Herald

Special NEW OFFER to Subscribers

We shall give you, free, a complete Bible Picture Contest Outfit, if you will recommend the Christian Herald to some person who is not now a subscriber of ours, secure his (or her) subscription, and send us that person's name and address, with only one dollar for the subscription—to begin at once and continue to the end of the year.

Or you can present this new eight months' subscription to some one whom you particularly want the message of the Christian Herald to reach. The recipient cannot but appreciate most heartily such a gift, consisting as it does of week after week of stirring news, editorials, fiction, artistic pictures, church and community departments, home helps and religious inspiration.

In any event you are really bestowing a favor on your neighbor or acquaintance in introducing the Christian Herald to her (or him); and we know from experience that the person addressed, if the matter is properly explained, will consider the subscription excellent value for the money. We expect the case to prove another instance of "once a reader, always a reader." For that reason, we are making it easy for your friend to get started. Just a dollar; that's all.

The Contest facts are rehearsed on the opposite page, and also down below where you see miniature illustrations of the books making up the Outfit. Read those details; and indeed you can have reprint of the Rules, object lessons and every other item of needed information, free on request. Knowing what the Contest is, you realize what a delightful convenience "Gems from the Bible" (the book containing all the possible answers for the pictures) and Reply Book (the pamphlet into which you can handily enter the answers of your choice) will be to you.

All the pictures, to date, are free with "Gems from the Bible" and Reply Book in the Contest Outfit.

Now for the first time we have the pleasure to announce our new offers, principally the one just mentioned, viz., the Outfit free to you, if you are a subscriber, and at once send us one dollar for a new subscription to run from now through the end of 1916. This is Offer A. See other offers across the page.

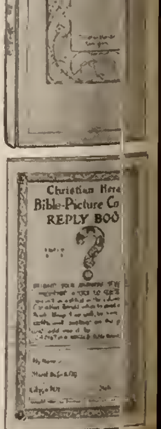
Complete Outfit of Bible Picture Contest



The little illustration at the top represents in reduced size the handy volume called "Gems from the Bible." The miniature reproduction below illustrates the specially designed blank book known as Contest Reply Book.

"Gems from the Bible" is the official standard of reference which will be used by the Contest judges. No Bible verse will be accepted as an answer for a Contest picture unless it is one of the verses in this little book. Therefore you now know where to look for the only eligible answers.

The Reply Book will save you the trouble of submitting answers separately under drawn pictures. In the Reply Book, proper spaces are already arranged; and you need only write down your answers on the appropriate pages of the Reply Book, then submit the Reply Book as your set of answers.

The Contest Pictures which have already been published are given with these two books, as well as Rules, etc., thus making up the fullest possible equipment, known as our Contest Outfit.

A Message to Christian Herald Subscribers

This message is meant for you. It conveys important news. It brings to you an unusual opportunity to do something that should be of untold value to some person, and which is also intended to bring a satisfying compensation to you.

This is a new message. It pertains chiefly to our Bible Picture Contest. It is of equal importance whether or not you are already a participant in the fascinating and educational study which is occupying the spare time of so many of our subscribers. Read every word so you will clearly understand.

You are fondly attached to this, your favorite periodical. You watch for its coming each week. You take interest in its numerous literary and artistic features. You like to read the Great Truths which pertain to right thinking and right living—the true Christian life. You have found much inspiration in the past, you are finding something every week that is helpful to you in maintaining the Better Life. In one form or another you have the precept of the Golden Rule unfolded and its value proved, every week.

You, having the fine Christian spirit, are ever wishful of doing good to others. Every such act brings its immediate return in an extra degree of happiness to yourself.

Surely you know at least one person or family that would be benefited by receiving the Christian Herald regularly. We ask you to go to such persons and show a few copies of this publication. Tell of the real benefit that it has brought to you—how it has helped you in your daily life by giving you genuine inspiration, stimulation, and the sincerest kind of enthusiasm. Suggest to your friend that she or he give you an eight months' subscription to the Christian Herald at one dollar. You may promise your friend—if she or he is not already a subscriber to this publication—that if at the end of eight months (which will be the end of this eventful year) the Herald has not proved itself well worth the dollar, we, the publishers, will promptly and without demur return that dollar upon a mere request. We authorize you to say this in our behalf. We offer this unhesitatingly.

You Can Obtain Outfit Free

As for you, dear Subscriber, we shall reward you for your effort in obtaining this new subscription by sending you, postpaid, the Bible Picture Contest Outfit. This consists of the Gems from the Bible and the Reply Book. Moreover, if you do not already possess them, we will send you a complete set of all the Bible Contest Pictures down to the present date.

You may, therefore, enter the Contest now. There will be a liberal allowance of time in which to pick out Bible verses that you consider fitted to the pictures. No other participant will be permitted to send in a Reply Book sooner than you. None may delay sending longer than the time allowed you. Thus you are assured of absolute fairness.

If you are already a participant, you doubtless will be glad to avail yourself of the privilege of sending in an extra Reply Book filled with verses. Or you may send even three Reply Books in your own name—the Rules grant this right to you—and thereby you enhance your interest three fold! While you may not need the additional copy, or copies, of Gems from the Bible, this book will make a nice present for somebody.

If your friend—the new subscriber—wishes to enter the Contest also, it will only be necessary to add an extra half-dollar to the subscription payment, making a total of $1.50; and this will bring a Bible Picture Contest Outfit to that person too. Thus the remittance of your friend's dollar and a half will cover the regular and cheering visits of the Christian Herald until the end of this year, as well as the two Outfits, one for your friend and one for yourself. Also note the variety of combination offers on the next page, any one of which you may accept.

We are making this new and generous offer only after careful consideration. We believe this is the time to extend the already wide scope of our circulation. We are keenly desirous of greatly augmenting our power to bring the Christian Herald each week to a multitude of persons whose lives will be made pleasanter by the visits of this popular journal.

This Is the Right Time to Start

The time to act is now! Do not put off seeing that friend of yours until tomorrow if you can do so today. Read further particulars on the opposite page. It should need but a slight effort on your part. Do not be timid in asking another. That would be a form of false modesty, especially as you will probably do a favor for which your friend will ever be grateful to you. If this journal were not such a genuinely helpful medium in the cause of Christianity and in the extension of human happiness, we could not urge you so strongly.

Letters from Bible Picture Contestants

The Picture Contest is the most delightful entertainer that I have ever found. It seemed at first a somewhat difficult task to find and apply verses to suit the pictures; but now it is my pleasure to scan my Bible, and with the help of the Gems find the verses applicable. It inspires me intellectually and—greatest of all—spiritually. May you extend the Herald to all ends of the world, and may this contest inspire people throughout the universe to read the great Book of books, the Bible. Miss L. H. R., Boton Rouge, La.

I am much interested in the Bible Picture Contest. It is an interesting study and worth our effort, even if no prizes were offered. That, however, is an incentive to a more careful search for correct answers. I am doing my best, and hope, with others, to be successful in winning one prize. Mrs. J. P. E., Payson, Ill.

I wish to add my praise to that of others in regard to the Picture Contest, for I find it the most interesting as well as instructive pastime that one can enjoy. Some of the pictures are quite puzzling and are all the more interesting, for it is certainly a good Bible study, which is far better than novel-reading. As for the paper itself, I do not think it has an equal for Bible inspiration and truth, which is far ahead of fiction; also for Bible news. The Bible first, the Christian Herald second, a good daily paper last, are all I find time to read. S. F. C., Addison, N. Y.

I'm very much interested in the Contest, only hoping it may cause others to search the Scriptures as I'm doing. Mrs. N. R., Murray, Ky.

I am trying in the Bible Picture Contest. I am so interested in it that I can hardly wait for the next week's paper. I hope to get one of the prizes. I'm working so hard for an education. My mother is a widow, and is helping me all she can. I've been to Sunday school all my life, but I cannot tell you how much your Contest has helped me. R. F. M., Lakemont, N.Y.

I would like you to know how much I appreciate the Picture Contest. We are delighted. My grandson, six years old, seems to get as much joy and pleasure from it as any of the family. Mrs. E. M. N., Whiteville, Tenn.

I write to let you know how pleased I am with the Bible Pictures. I think they are fine, and they ought to interest both old and young in the Bible. You ask your readers what they would do if they received $1,250. My answer would be, the same as on any sum of money; one-tenth would belong to Christ's cause, toward the upbuilding of all that pertains to the saving of souls. Mrs. M. F. L., Shelburne Falls, Mass.

I received my Picture Contest Outfit, and am at work. I am glad to send you the names of three friends who I think will enjoy this work with their children. It is a wonderful incentive to Bible study. Mrs. B. G. P., North East, Pa.

I am getting much pleasure as well as profit out of the study of the Pictures. Mrs. J. B. B., Pelzer, S. C.

I would like to tell you how much I enjoy the Picture Contest. I am so anxious for every paper to come; I always look forward for it with great pleasure. Mrs. J. H. G., Cass Station, Ga.

—but let me say, in all these I have not found anything to equal the Bible Picture Contest. S. C. F., Spokane, Wash.

Merry Moments

A GREAT many of our subscribers have responded to the little paragraph which we have twice printed at the head of the Merry Moments column. We are glad to see such evidence of the prompt welcome of Merry Moments by the Christian Herald Family. Perhaps we did not make ourselves quite clear, but we do not want clippings or copies of anecdotes already published, as we have abundant opportunity to clip humor from other papers. We hoped that our readers might know of funny incidents, the story of which had not been told, and some of these have come to us. We would like more. We cannot, however, pay for stories which have already appeared in print.]

He Had Qualified.—A stranger in an Indiana village thought he might improve the time by attending service in the local church. At the conclusion of a lengthy talk, the minister announced that he should like to meet the Board. The stranger, in company with several other persons, proceeded to walk to the front of the church. The pastor, thinking there must be some misunderstanding, said to him: "I believe, sir, you are mistaken. This is just to be a meeting of the Board."

"Well," replied the visitor, "I have listened to you talk for more than an hour and if anyone has been more bored than I have been, I should like to know who it is."

Unconscious Truth.—A little girl was learning the Golden Text for the next Sunday's lesson. Closing the book, she began, "Wine is a mocker; strong drink is raging, and—and—ah, and ah," when her little sister, who was at play, but had partially caught the words, thinking to help her out, said, "And whosoever is seated nearby is not wise."

Turned Down?

In a parlor there were three:
  A maid, a parlor lamp and he.
Two are company, without a doubt,
  And so the parlor lamp went out.

There Might Have Be —A Boston minister who always prea s to large congregations made sanctim ious, psalm-singing, professed Christia who have no real religion in their mal up a target for his wit. A little bo who heard him remarked after he r rned home from the morning service:

"Mother, I shouldn't have t ught Dr. Blank would have spoken th way about Christians this morning. here might have been some of th n in church."—Exchange.

Moving Pictures.—"Some ople are humorous without even know g it."

"As when, for instance?"

"Here's a man advertises a lec e on 'The Panama Canal, illustrate with slides.'"—Chicago Herald.

True at Least.—The quest n on the examination board was: What is the office of the gastric juice? The student answered: "In business urs, the stomach."—Exchange.

Just for Instance, Prob y.—"Now, my son," said the consci tious father, "tell me why I punished ou."

"That's it," blubbered th boy, indignantly. "First you pound the life out of me, an' now you don' now what you done it for."—Exchan

A Natural Reply.—The othe ay a young woman teacher took ei t of her pupils through a museum of tural history. "Well, my boy, where you go with your teacher this after on?" asked John's mother on his retu

With joyous promptness he an ered. "She took us to a dead circus."

So Annoying.—A very inq itive man was sitting at table next a m who had lost an arm above the elbow.

"I see your have lost an arm," ually was ventured.

The one-armed man picked his empty sleeve and peered into it.

"Great Scott! I believe I ha " he answered.

Amarilly in Book Form

WE have had so many inquiries for "Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley" in book form that it gives us much pleasure to announce that we have secured a special edition of this splendid story, which appeared in the Christian Herald, and which was read with so much interest and amusement. No one who has read the book can forget the charm of Amarilly. This quaint little character, who is the inspiration of not only her own family, but all their acquaintances, appeals strongly to the human side of every one of her friends and admirers. There is sweet humor and genuine cheeriness between the covers of this book; many laughs and a tear or two as well. Amarilly is a constant surprise and delight.

We will present Amarilly with our compliments to any present subscriber who will send us a new subscription for eight months, accompanied by $1.

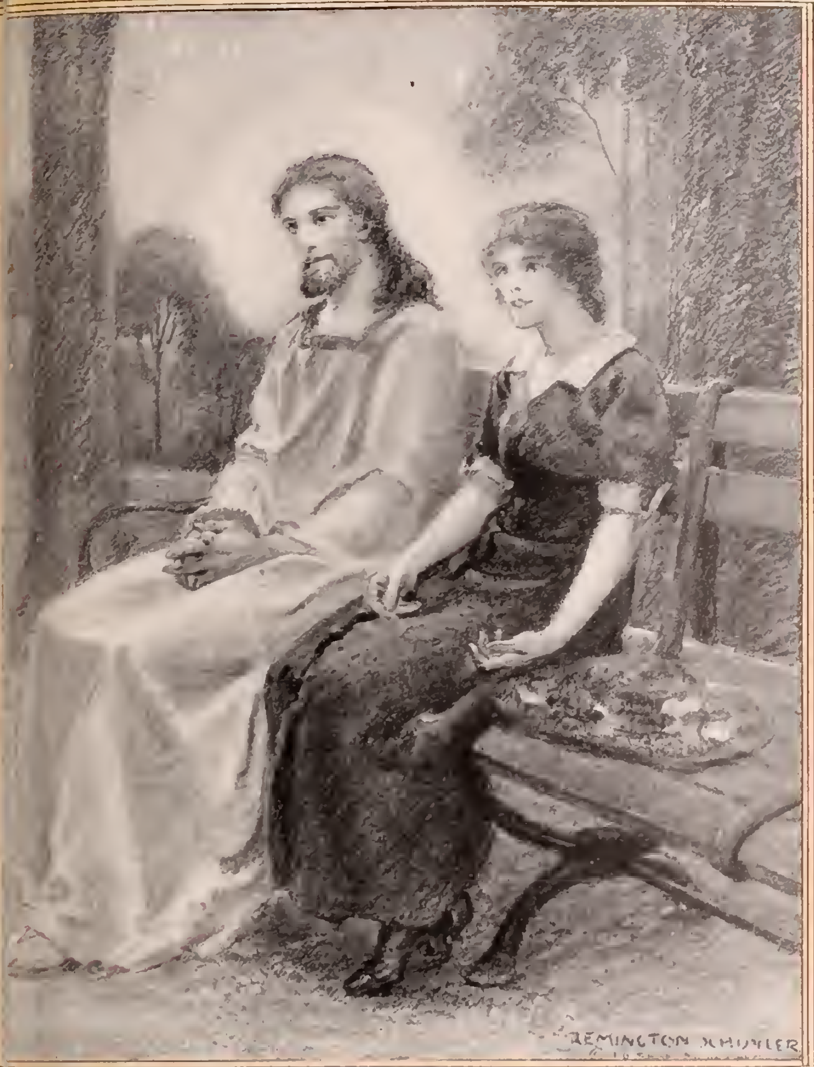
"BE OF GOOD CHEER!"

Margaret E. Sangster Jr.



Temptation came to me to day,
And oh! I felt that I must stray
Down primrose paths, forgetting all.
The city's fevered, siren call
Spoke to my soul, it's whispered cry
Said "Live, for Youth, too soon, will die!"

So all alone, when work was done,
I sought the park. The setting sun
Had left a bit of warmth for me-
I found a bench beneath a tree,
And sat and thought.
My life is hard,
Sometimes my heart seems battle-scarred
With longings keen, and bitter fears,
And want, and suffering, and tears.

Temptation spoke, and Youth spoke back;
The night seemed cold and dark and black,
And every light was like a star
That cleft the sky-they were so far,
So very far away! And I
Was lonely, there, beneath the sky.

Far off there is a little farm
A tiny place, remote from harm;
There used to be a mother frail,
And sweet, with hair as silver-pale
As the faint moon. She heard me say
The words when first I learned to pray.

Above me in the silent trees,
I heard the rustle of the breeze.
It sounded like her step so light,
Her step from out the endless night.
My mother—

"Ah, the name so sweet,
Brought memories on noiseless feet.
And softly in the darkness, there,
I breathed my little childhood prayer.
Do prayers have answers? As I prayed
A Presence came, and gently laid
A Hand upon my arm. I knew
That Someone kind, and good, and true
Was very near. Upon my soul
A peace swept down, and left it whole.
I felt a calm steal over me,
The same that stilled the troubled sea
Where Jesus walked.
My fears were laid,
Temptation left me unafraid.
And as I smiled, there in the park,
A voice spoke through the fragrant dark.
"Be of good cheer!" the words rang out
Above the city's groan and shout.

And all the lights that I could see
Were stars of home, agleam for me!

Opportunities for Service

Just Four Letters, but They Tell a Wonderful Story of Christian Effort in Varied Fields

WE have just received a letter from Mr. William A. Mowry of North Wilbraham, Mass., which suggests a fi l of Gospel endeavor that has not ee cultivated heretofore in just this way The letter is as follows:

Chr an Herald:

G lemen: Morton L. Day of Hampden, Mass., died ugust 23, 1915, at the home of his sister, Mrs. Elvira C. Bla ard of North Wilbraham, Mass. In his will, Mr. Day eft ,000, the income of which was to be used for subscription the Christian Herald, being divided between the town of H pden, Mass., and Wilbraham, Mass., and held in trust by I titution of Savings of Springfield, Mass. That is, interest on $500 to Wilbraham and interest on $500 to Hampden. Sub iptions to be given to families who are not able to subs be, left to the discretion of Library trustees of each town Mr. Day had been a subscriber for many years. His siste Mrs. E. C. Blanchard, died January 5, 1916, a noble, kind soul, who will be greatly missed by a large circle of frien . Had long been a subscriber.

I ught you would like to know these facts and publish same Please acknowledge same. Yours truly, (Signed) WILLIAM A. MOWRY.

N w, here is a trust which, when it is administered, will ovide an outlet of perpetual endeavor in mission wor It is one which may not have suggested itself to ers, but which might very well be followed by any e who desires to embrace such an opportunity, not essarily waiting until the matter can be arran l in the form of a legacy, but by instituting the vor during one's lifetime. We feel so much in ym thy with the novel method and good intent of o departed friend that we shall make a special price of one dollar a year for the Christian Heralds which are distributed on account of this legacy. We ill do that for any one who desires to create an e lowment of a similar nature. The Christian Her l might thus become a perpetual missionary to any who, perhaps, could not otherwise be reac d.

We are also in receipt of a letter addressed to the Bowery Mission, which reads as follows:

Bowery Mission, New York City:

Gentlemen: Enclosed check for $5 in answer to your call for aid in your last number of the Christian Herald.

It is always a pleasant duty for me to perform to contribute to your noble cause. About 32 years ago I was a drunkard and a tramp and the Bowery Mission brought me back in the right path.

I am now father of five happy children and occupy a very enviable position in society. Thanks to your institution. Call again. Very truly yours,

C. E. C.

Here is another letter which shows what the Christian Herald stands for in relation to home mission work in a field where the need is very great:

The Golden Industrial Institute,
Golden, N. C.

The Christian Herald, New York, N. Y.:

Gentlemen: This is the third week we have missed the Christian Herald from our files, and I write to ask you if you have dropped our needy mountain school from your list.

No paper coming to us is more sought after and appreciated. I took a boy out of jail some two years ago and have been trying our best to make something out of him—though a tough case indeed; yet he seems to miss the Christian Herald so much and asked me several times if I had written about its not coming.

Last year was a sore trial to us, financially, as our school, which is situated in one of the most isolated shut-in rural sections in the United States, greatly suffered for lack of help.

Pardon a personal reference, but I am here giving my time, strength and love, without salary or commission, for these neglected mountain children. I am 78 years old and never walked a natural step in my life so far as I know, but always on crutch or cane. For nearly five years I have never had $25 for my personal use.

I only mention these facts to show you that I am not here for gain, but for the boys and girls of these lone mountains the greatest and neediest mission field in America

We trust under our circumstances you can and will continue to send the Christian Herald to our school this year as you did last, and we would so much appreciate the back numbers for the three weeks we have missed the paper. This school in all its poverty has helped lift many out of illiteracy to an education and salvation, and by God's grace and human help will lift many more.

(Rev.) L. U. GNEAD.

From far afield comes the following, which gives a glimpse of what has been done through the Christian Herald for the education and spiritual uplift of orphans in China:

Chinkiang, China.

The Christian Herald China Orphan Work, New York, N. Y.:

Gentlemen: The orphans in the Nanking Orphanage of the Christian Herald, under the care of the American Advent Christian Mission, have made progress in their studies and their manual training as well.

January 1, 1915, we had eighty-four orphans. January 1, 1916, we have sixty-three. The boys who have left the orphanage are supporting themselves; some are house-boys, one or two are in hospital training to be nurses, others are cooks, two are laundrymen, and others are doing various kinds of work. What they would have been had not the friends of orphans through the Christian Herald sent money for their support, is hard to imagine; but that they have been saved and taught a useful trade whereby they are self-supporting, self-respecting Christian boys and girls, speaks volumes for the Christian religion.

A more practical way of doing missionary work is not to be found. The Chinese cannot but be impressed with the superiority of a religion that will help the helpless. Their condition physically, spiritually and every other way when they came to us and the condition when they left us a few years later would take more than pen and ink to describe. One needs to see in order to believe.

(Signed) G. HOWARD MALONE.

It soothes tortured feet on city pavements, on the farm, in the drawing room or behind the counter.

How many tired, nerve-worn women owe their plight to their neglected feet—unaware that there is healing in a dash of talcum powder in the shoe.

The talcum that restores aching feet never fails to soothe the tenderer skin of face and body. No better can be made no matter what you pay. The House of Mennen was founded to produce a soothing toilet powder. Hence, while exquisitely perfumed, it is not merely a vehicle for perfume.

Mennen's Talcums—all with the original borated formula, that has never been bettered—include a variety to satisfy every need: Borated, Violet and Unscented; Sen Yang, with a delicate Oriental perfume; Flesh Tint and Cream Tint, each charmingly perfumed.

If son or husband is in the habit of appropriating your talcum, get him a box of his own the next time you pass your druggist's. The new Talcum for Men, used after shaving with Mennen's Shaving Cream, leaves the face free from the pallor of a white talcum. Send 5c for a trial can of any one.

Buy talcums for the family by the half dozen. The jolly Mennekins, a fascinating set of blocks for the kiddies, come with an assortment of six Mennen talcums. Ask your druggist, or we will send them direct, carriage prepaid for $1.50.

MENNEN'S

IS BOON TO WOMAN MISSIONARY

"My missionary work in Korea often requires long, weary tramps over sun-baked trails.

"At first my feet caused me excruciating pain.

"One day I sprinkled Mennen's Borated Talcum Powder in my shoes. The relief was wonderful. By keeping my feet dry and soothed, it entirely prevents swelling and blistering—and lengthens the life of shoes."

Mennen's is as potent a foot samaritan in Kansas, Connecticut, or Kentucky as it is in Korea.

United States 'Nobby' Tread Tires

The Grip in the Knobs

The knobs on the 'Nobby' Tread "bite" the road-surface like a file on metal.

The traction is so intense that it is next to impossible for the tread to slip or skid.

It is the angle, height, thickness, toughness and resiliency of the knobs that make 'Nobby' Treads the surest of anti-skid tires—the Aristocrats of the Road.

While 'Nobby' Tread sales have increased phenomenally, adjustments (on the basis of five thousand miles) have gone down to an almost unwritably small fraction of the total sales.

THE RETURN

By
HEDGAR PLUVLANNES

IT ıs a September evening ir 1915. In the cool night, tl train of French *grands bl'es penetrates into Switz-erlan coming fron Con-stanc Suddenly the air is lighter, the oppre ion more bearable. A sigh of relief omes out of all hearts. It is not yet t beloved country, but rather like the v coming and smiling antechamber of it.

"H we are, old boy," says a soldier o an her, a poor mutilated comrade on cou . "We have left it!"

A diant smile answers back, "Yes, we ha left it. . . . And soon . . ."

"A soon! Don't speak of it, old ellow

"SCAFFHAUSEN!" . . . German is sl spoken, but the faces have changl. Hands are stretched toward the soliers; cakes and all sorts of good thing are offered; flowers are spread on the nrow couches.

Yes it is the return from exile. One begin to inhale the air of liberty. Oh, oy!

"ZÜICH!" Crescendo! Here live undreds of French men and women, nd t atmosphere is less heavy than in ny oer town of German Switzerland.

Mafestations are more cordial; some more kes, sweets, flowers—great sheaves f flors! Beautiful white and red roses, mixed vith tall blue campanulas, which make lendid bouquets in French colors; nd the asters, the single dahlias, the carna ns, the heliotropes, and more roses, ways more roses!

The soldiers are dazzled, overjoyed. This eshness, these gay colors, those dainty tissues, the exquisite perfumes, seem come from a world that has been shut them ever since they entered the war, h its coarseness, its roughness, its monst sities.

Gradually, they come back to an atmosphe where sensations are not all of mat al order; and those flowers, those smiles he friendly words, lead them, little y lit, into the sympathetic surroundings vere they will be tomorrow.

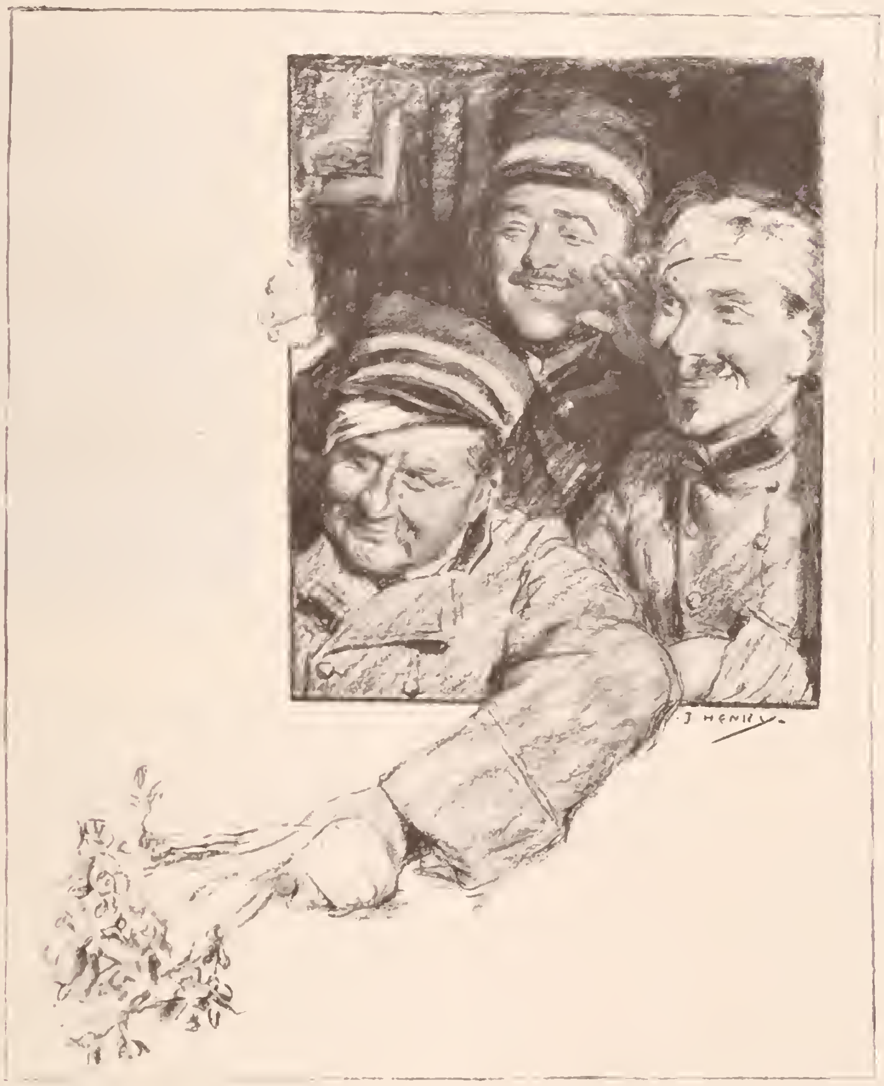
The train starts again, carrying its heroic charges. Officers and soldiers, round, eager to count their treasures, tas the delicacies, smell their bunches f flo rs, all under the care of smiling nurses nd devoted doctors.

MINIGHT. One o'clock. Two clock. The train stops again.

"W t is this little hole?" asks a soldier, o peeps through the window and ees c fusedly a station of small importance. "Usually we stop only in big ones."

"M ran!" answers a Red Cross nurse. "We in the canton of Fribourg."

"W do they stop here?" asks a little Marseilais soldier, with his head all bandaged, but with eyes as bright as those of a squirrel.



Some one goes out and inquires.

"We are going to have a crossing with the train which brings back from France the German wounded prisoners," answers a railway man.

The Swiss doctors look at each other in dismay. The nurses, rather uneasy, hasten to entertain their patients in some way or other in order to divert their minds from the coming meeting.

If one could avoid a painful incident!

But already a voice has shouted, "Here are the Germans!"

A RAPID whistling, a thundering noise, and the expected train stops, exactly opposite the first one. The wounded enemies can see each other—could touch each other, if they liked.

The good Swiss spend a really anxious minute. The French are kind-hearted, to be sure, but so quick, so impulsive! If they are going to say something disagreeable for everybody!

Oh, good Swiss, be reassured! Your hospitable soil will not be dishonored!

Quick as lightning the French soldiers who still have arms and legs to move them, look out of the windows. In their arms (though some have but one) they hold the flowers they have received with such joy.

"What are they going to do?" mutter the good Swiss in a paroxysm of distress.

THEN, with a unanimous gesture, in a single outburst, the flowers take wings through the windows and fall lightly on the wounded Germans, on the narrow couches, covering them with their lovely perfumed petals.

At the same time, some deep voices come out from the French soldiers' train.

"Poor comrades! Perhaps we have wounded them! Take these flowers . . . and these . . . and these. . . ."

But before the arms are all emptied, the train moves on. All this has taken just one or two minutes, and the French wagons defile, leaving the German cars all gay with French colors.

The train flies along in the beautiful starry night.

THE men have sat down again and chat as before, without any emotion. What have they done that might be called out of the common?

But the little Marseillais heaves a deep sigh.

"Lucky chaps! They come from France!"

The others laugh: "And we go there!"

The Swiss doctors look at each other again. If they dared, they would make some comment; but they do not trust the firmness of their voices.

The nurses bend more tenderly over their patients. Their eyes are a little wet and they don't hide it. Women are not ashamed of such things, nor need they be, indeed.

"That was well done," says one to a soldier who had been still more kind than the others.

He smiles good naturedly. "What? Those flowers? How could we hate anybody? They are men just as we are! Ah, I would not have given my lovely roses to a Prussian chief, I can tell you! But those poor fellows, mutilated as we are . . . well, no, you see, they are not all responsible . . . one may be a soldier, but one has a heart. . . ."

"LAUSANNE!" Ah! what a good town is Lausanne! Here, no constraint. One can shout "Vive la France!" in a full voice. And nobody misses the treat. Here, new provisions are brought, good things to eat, good things to see, and heaps of flowers of all colors.

"For the next German train!" gravely declares the little Marseillais, in hanging his bouquet to the window.

And the others all laugh.

"GENEVA!" As in Lausanne, new hurrahs, some flowers, chocolates, cakes, handshakes, affectionate wishes.

Geneva! It is nearly France; the door is going to open!

"Direction de Lyon," tells the large indicating board. This word makes the soldiers' hearts jump. They are getting near; soon exile will be only a bitter remembrance of a dark past.

The train goes on again. The landscapes defile, nearly all alike. Nothing reveals a change. Every one talks, sings and rejoices. They are running toward France, toward the reunion with the beloved!

SUDDENLY the train, because of a sharp turn of the railway, slackens its movement. During this short while, the sound of a French military trumpet is brought by the wind.

One would say an invisible hand has pressed on an electric button. A great silence has fallen and will last until the end of the journey. The beloved country is here at last, the saddened country, for whose freedom they have fought and shed their blood! They must collect their thoughts in meditation. Thank God, forever they are back from exile!

Then, softly, when a nurse passes by: "Madame, would you, please, give me some water, some soap and a towel? I want to be extra clean to arrive in France!"

And another: "Madame, if you please, a little flower in my buttonhole. I want to be fine to see my mother!"

"And I, madame, please, a little bit of three-colored ribbon."

All the nurses (some are great ladies), their eyes full of tears, comply with these simple requests. Their clever and motherly fingers hasten to wash a thin, pale face, decorate a buttonhole with a flower or a cockade.

SUDDENLY the doors of the carriages open briskly. Some officers come in, cups of wine in their hands.

"Children! We are in France!"

Tears of joy roll down the white faces And while each soldier sips from his chief's cup, a loud cry goes up from the train flying toward Bellegarde: "Vive la France!"

The Easter Call to Service

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

DURING my first week in my home town, after four years of missionary teaching in Syria and China (and incidental travel in Europe, Egypt, India, Korea and Japan), a former schoolmate stopped me on the street and after a little talk said, "What wouldn't I have given to be in your shoes!" Every young man with a real desire to serve, and a fair education, can do what I did.

I shall not discuss the permanent missionary. There is not a nobler calling in the world, nor a manlier group of men—nor a nobler group of women. The permanent missionary can stand with the best of men without shame (unless it be on the part of the best of men) outside the missionary calling After knowing scores of missionaries, railway presidents and corporation lawyers seem common and unimportant. I said this to a man with whom I traveled from Omaha to Chicago, and as we parted he gave me his card and asked me to lunch with him. He is one of the great lawyers of the Middle West.

I shall only discuss the short-term man. At Robert College, near Constantinople, three-year men just out of college are molding the future of the Near East. In the Syrian Protestant College, a score or so of young college graduates are plumbing the keen minds of the young men of the Near East, and helping them in a year of trouble and unrest The future is being forged in the heat of cruel war, and young Americans are directing the best minds of the Levant. Think of tho responsibility and privilege of directing the thoughts and friendships of a dozen heterogeneous races in time of war!

In Tarsus and Smyrna, Assiut and Cairo, Lahore and Allahabad, Canton and Peking, Seoul and Mukden, Kyoto and Tokyo, Rangoon and Mandalay, Jaro and Dumaguette, Buenos Aires and Santiago, there are schools which need live young men, and need them badly right now.

The pay is not great. The work is exacting, and, unless brightened by imagination and a desire for Christlike service, insufferably tedious. Love for one's fellow men is the prime requisite for such work. This is no globe-trotter's task. But for the young man of imagination, whose horizon is not bounded by the limits of his native town, whose veins throb with red blood and love of adventure, whose mind seeks to grasp the large ideas of world thought, and who wishes to aid in the soul-stirring attempt to save the world from sin and ruin, this is an inspiring opportunity.

He may have no intention to spend his life abroad, or to follow the ministry or the teaching profession as a means of useful livelihood. He may return to the homeland to take up law or medicine, journalism or business, politics or philanthropy. Still, those three years of hearty service will make him a bigger, broader, better man.

The first baccalaureate I remember was in high school. It was on leadership. The young students listened attentively and hopefully to this entrancing message. The college baccalaureate was on service. The high school stimulus of leadership had given way to a big ideal. The one address was for high school minds, like the hero worship of a child. The other was a call to do a man's work in a man's world of realities.

The short-term man is indispensable in the direct impact of Christian thought and action on non-Christian conduct. He brings the latest of western learning direct to his student. His enthusiasm and ardor has had no time to cool in tedious language study. His very bluntness and lack of understanding, combined with his earnest desire to help, are an asset. He lives with the students, eats with them, plays with them. They know his every act and thought. His control over them is that of friendship, not espionage.

Some of the livest permanent missionaries got their first interest in missions during a short term. An unusually large percentage of short-term men return to a place as permanent missionaries with exceptional understanding of the work they are to do. The time will come when all educational missionaries will be forced to spend three years in the work, before studying the language and deciding on a permanent field. The man who has once tasted foreign missionary service may continue to work abroad or not. But till the day of his death his work is tinged by a knowledge of what he could do to servo mankind as a missionary teacher, pointing tho backward races to a better life.

Practically all the personal contact, discipline and direct Christian appeal in the larger schools is in the hands of the short-term man who spends twenty-four hours of the day with his students. One young teacher at Beirut had a student come to his room after he had been expelled by the powers higher up. The student, showing a check for a large sum, said that if he was forced to leave in disgrace he would deliberately go to hell with the money. He had very definite ideas as to the road he would travel.

The weighty matter of making coffee in a Beduin desert c p is a rite seldom seen by outsiders

The short-term instructor took charge of the student, who was for that reason allowed to remain in that teacher's class. In one year that student grew from a weak-willed, vicious sneak to a half-mile winner whose scholarship had greatly improved and who had stopped smoking and worse habits, and developed a strong body and a manly will. The college had given him up as a bad job. The instructor kept him straight and left him at the end of the year with character enough to overcome his temptations. The college president had his own home and family life. The three-year man slept in the same building with the student, and molded his character by sheer force of continual contact. The short-term man is the real driving force in the advance of modern educational missions.

The Christian of the old school says: "If you can get a man to decide for missions, sign him up for life."

The mission field holds men who are square pegs in round holes, sticking to a work for which they are not fitted by the strength of their promise. But where one man will sign for life, five will go out for short terms, with equally high ideals and enthusiasm Out of the five that go out for short terms, three ma stick as permanent missionaries.

MISSIONARY work from the standpoint dull tracts, missionary talks and a sense o duty attracts virile, earnest men. But it attracts t few Besides, no man ought to be a missionary o of a sense of duty. It is a man's job, big enough the biggest, and if a missionary stays in the work ut of a mistaken sense of duty he is acting as dog the manger in a mighty important position. It is a ecognized fact on the field today that in education missionary work the best and most enthusiastic n are those who went out first on short-term contrac

The short term is attractive to many who ould never consider for a moment what an ignorant iend of mine called "a life sentence among the filthy athen," but who, knowing the call of missionar work from its personal side after three years of fresh preeful contact, decide that their lives will count f nost in that work.

Selfishness of a low kind keeps good men it of mission work. Selfishness of the highest kin eeps the best men in mission work. The man who inks mission work is a sacrifice fails to understand.

Missions are a live proposition, offering xceptional blessings, but one must work in them find that out, and many good men shrink from a le into the unknown even if they are equipped with a ayer rug and a Bible. These very men do go out f hor terms, "just for experience," and follow this by permanently allying themselves with a wor that the have come to love for the good it accomplises.

The challenge of the East to the Christian zeal of the West

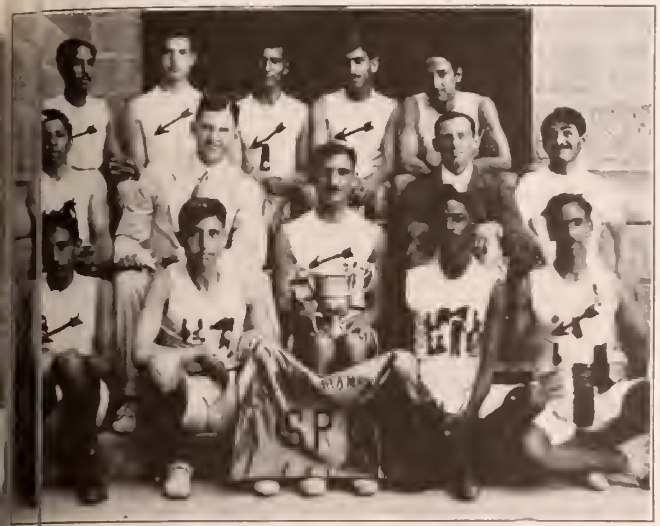
Inow a dozen young men in America now whose one lea is to get a job when they graduate. There are housands of such in America today. Think of the gnominy of it—educated men forced by strong conetition to hunt for a job, well knowing that when the get it they may be depriving their classmates of an portunity to earn the necessities of life! Yet the reat awaking world of the East is calling earnes for those men to "come over and help us."

Ivoung men knew the advantages of such work, the would be a stampede of young men in the direc n of the mission boards, demanding such work as have described. This is just as it should be. Tho ositions open under mission boards today merit the nest men that our universities can turn out.

Tere is no danger of the world field being flooded wit men who seek this work as a means of selfadvicement. Mission boards are not in the business of offering ambitious graduates short cuts to fam and fortune. With the meager funds at their dispal, they must consider carefully before they sen man half way around the world on a threeyear ontract. But if anyway you are going to be turl down by the first dozen employers to whom you ply after leaving college, why not let six of them be ssion boards!



lassmates: Abyssinian, Egyptian, Syrian, Armenian, Turk, Persian; and their three-year term teacher, the author

Y will not be expected to preach. Possibly you will ot even read the Bible in public. Mission schs flourish on the principle that what a young teaer does and thinks speaks much louder to the you men whose language he cannot use than any wor he says.

A issionary teacher can out-tennis, out-baseball and t-run most of mankind. I once saw a missionary ty years old stand twenty feet away from the basl, and drop in five field goals without a miss. But hat is not his real value. The missionary teaer's real value lies in the fact that he is a man of Gl, standing at the junction of the East and West, of c servatism and progress, and doing what he can to cy some of the best of Occidental life and thought to t nations of the Orient at a time when the worst of our e and products are undermining their character.

IF America is to stand before the world as a benefactor and not as a destroyer, she must send forth purposeful men of God to combat the effects of the vices she is sending, which are already eating like cankerous sores at the hearts of the backward nations. Commercial firms are sending out young men full of "pep" and go, and keeping them abroad for short periods only. Missionary schools need this same dash and vigor on the part of young, unmarried men who become intimate companions to their students by living with them. But the number of young men who go out is so small that the mission boards have to hang onto them for fear successors will not arrive on the field where they are so much needed. I left one of the finest small missionary schools nearly a year ago, but no successor has been found yet.

"Is missionary work really enjoyable? How can you stand such filth, such ignorance, such sin?"

Is the missionary some degenerate who prefers the filthy languorous life of the Orient to the efficient cleanliness of the West? Not a bit of it. He does not enjoy filth; he cleans it up. He does not tolerate ignorance; he banishes it. He does not enjoy sin; he fights it.

He does not love the heathen dirty. He gives him a shower bath, the ability to read and think, and a knowledge of God's love; and, lo, his heathen is an earnest Christian, leading classes at Yale or Columbia, and returning to useful service in his native land. No one loves a coolie on account of his dirt. The missionary student loves his students in spite of their faults, and then helps rid them of their faults until he is truly glad to call them his brothers.

In China a young man came to a small mission school where athletics were practically unknown. He tore down a Buddhist temple and laid out fields for volleyball, tennis, football, basketball, and indoor baseball. Each morning he held an inspection of the costumes, teeth and finger-nails of the students, and put them through a stiff setting-up drill before breakfast.

Some military officers came to learn basketball, and the mission basketball fields were copied in twelve centers in a city of nearly a million. In one year 3,000 soldiers learned the game.

The young man returned to America, but when the teachers called for a composition on "How I Spent My Vacation," nearly every one of the Chinese lads said, "I exercised every day." This American teacher was known by his Oriental students as "Mr. Hurry-up." One American manufacturer of athletic goods sold a trial order of $400 to this one small school through the influence of that short-term man.

MISSIONARY teaching is the livest adventure I have ever known. Being lost in a desert is mild excitement compared with that of seeing your track team win a meet in the last event of the day. I remember with the greatest satisfaction the cruel joy I took in personally scrubbing a man till the harsh brush made his skin glow. That may not sound Christian, but it is. Day after day that student skipped his shower bath after exercise. The boys knew that he was lying every time he dipped into a wash basin and with dripping head made believe that he had had his cold shower; and though they despised him for his deceit and filth they stuck together with a race consciousness that was admirable. But when the two of us stood under the same cold shower and his blood responded to the brush, not a single student sympathized with him. So far as I know he never skipped a shower bath again. Any mother who has washed her son's ears and any man who has memories of that painful process will understand the Christianity of fighting dirt. A principal could not do such a thing without losing dignity. The short-term man, living with his students, has no need of maintaining the same degree of superior aloofness.

Recreation hours for the teaching staff of a missionary college in the near East

The growing spirit of brotherhood, nearness and internationalism promoted by Christian missions is the greatest movement of modern times. Whether or no, America is being forced into international affairs. But the American missionary is not being forced into this world movement of sympathetic understanding. He has helped create it. He is a leader in promoting the brotherhood which binds American colleges to the four corners of the world.

The challenge of the future comes to every young American of ideals and imagination. America has a duty to itself and to the nations of the world to get and to give. Provincial isolation is no longer possible. No American agencies are doing so much to further the highest American ideals as are American missionaries. No missionaries come so close to the young men of the foreign nations as do the unmarried, enthusiastic, hale-fellow-well-met young men who go out on short contracts, carrying an ever new and insistent message of democratic brotherhood and practical Christianity to those who need and appreciate it.

From a selfish standpoint a young man cannot do better. From a patriotic standpoint an American cannot do more to promote friendship for the land he loves. As one who believes in the inevitable challenge of the future as to whether he has spent his life in loving his neighbor as himself, a Christian man makes no mistake in leaving home ties to make friends among the outcasts of India or the coolies of China.

I THINK of long desert rides in the moonlight with my colleagues at my side; of the Christian songs we sang out on the old Roman altar at Petra beneath the clear sky of an Oriental night; of the shriek of shells over my classroom one spring day; of the famous sites where Jesus lived; of Sancta Sophia, the Pyramids, Philae and the Taj Mahal; of the football games and track meets; of a thousand fez-topped heads singing Christian hymns in a Moslem land; of chill trips on the open decks of steamers, with marmalade and bread for food and Mecca pilgrims for bed-fellows; of breathless rides in Egypt's midsummer heat; and of the long, lonesome waits for mail from home.

I think of that poor Chinese boy in whose eyes real tears stood, as we shook hands in the manner of the "foreign devil" and parted. I had come a "foreign devil." We parted friends. What has heat and filth, ignorance and superstition to offer to offset that pleasure?

Missionaries are not long-haired idealists fighting straw men of their own manufacture, or assailing the institutions which they are doing nothing to help. They are molding the leaders of the future in Africa, Asia and South America. To share, even for a short time, in the work of these strategists of a living God and a vital Christianity is an enviable privilege for any man. The challenge of missions to the young men of America is that of unparalleled opportunity for Christian service combined with unparalleled opportunity for self-development and Christian leadership.

A Week in the World's News

American Laymen and World Missions. The National Missionary Congress will meet in Washington, April 26-30. This congress is the culmination of a series of more than 70 laymen's conventions held throughout the country since last October. President Wilson signified his intention to be present at the opening session. The congress will be a combination of addresses and discussion in which will be included some striking motion pictures showing missionary work up to date. Among the speakers are Robert E. Speer, presiding officer of the Panama Congress, who has just returned from an extended missionary trip in the Far East; John R. Mott, chairman of the Edinburgh Conference Continuation Committee, who has visited Europe twice since the beginning of the present war; Hubert C. Herring, general secretary of the National Council of the Congregational Churches, and a foremost home missionary statesman; Shailer Mathews, president of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America; George Innis, a layman who gave up a prosperous business to devote his life to mission work; J. Campbell White, organizer of the Laymen's Missionary Movement; George Sherwood Eddy, the man who has spread the flaming fire of evangelism throughout China and India; Bishop Arthur S. Lloyd of the Protestant Episcopal Church; Raymond Robbins, one of America's foremost students of social problems; John F. Goucher, a man known throughout the world of missions; Bishop Francis J. McConnell of the M. E. Church; Dr. James L. Barton of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Dr. William F. Oldham, former Methodist bishop and now corresponding secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions, and other men equally well known in American religious and civic life.

Not Waiting for Peace. Professor Frederick Starr, of the University of Chicago, who reached this country early in April after six months' research work in anthropology in Japan and Korea, reports that Japan is already colonizing the Ladrone and Marshall Islands, which she captured from Germany early in the war. These islands lie about half way between Hawaii and the Philippines.

Railroads Meet Demands with Demands. On the first threat of a strike by the railway men, the business interests of the country began an organized effort to bring the differences between the roads and their men before a board of arbitration. The companies, on March 31, through two of the roads concerned, answered the proposals of the employees for an eight-hour day and higher rates for overtime by demanding, on their part, that there shall be no double compensation for the same time of service; that the same classification for the purpose of compensation shall be applied to all members of a train and engine crew; and that two or more differently paid classes of service performed in the same day or trip should be paid proportionate rates, according to the class of service, with not less than a minimum day for the combined service. The railroads claim that present standards of rates and working conditions have been fixed by mediation and arbitration and are "adequate and even liberal to the employees."

This object lesson in "preparedness" was paraded through New York to advertise a mass meeting of protest against the extremists in national defense. To the facsimile beast was attached a placard reading: "This is Jingo, the armored Dinosaur. This animal believed in huge armament. He is now extinct."

Someone Is Always Taking the Joy Out of the Boy's Life. Glycerine, which is usually a by-product in the manufacture of soap, has lately reached such a value and demand that soap factories are being worked overtime in order to produce the glycerine, and the result is an unsalable surplus of soap. The overproduction is already serious, and it is even possible that soap may be given away in order to dispose of it. This will be bad news to the small boy.

Record Aeroplane Flight. On April 1 Stephen McGordon piloted a Curtiss biplane carrying a passenger from Newport News to Washington and return, covering about 300 miles in four and one-half hours without stopping the engine. This is a new record for a sustained flight with a passenger, the latest previous record having been made by Lieutenant Dodd, U. S. A., on February 14, in a flight from San Diego to Burbank, Calif., 244 miles.

Waste Raised the Price. In a recent address before the Society of Automobile Engineers, the opinion was expressed that gasoline would never revert to before-the-war prices, and that relief would come in the use of kerosene. Reference was made to the phenomenal increase in the automobile industry and in the use of tractors, motor boats, farming machinery, stationary engines and other devices burning gasoline Control of the distribution and exportation of this fuel by a tax on exports was suggested, and curtailment of waste, which the United States Bureau of Mines estimates at $50,000,000 a year, in crude oil was urged. The government figures show that in 1914, 34,915,000 barrels of gasoline were produced, of which 5,000,000 barrels were exported. In 1915, out of a production of 41,600,000 barrels, 6,500,000 were exported. Conservative estimate of the consumption of 1916 places the American requirement for the year at 42,000,000 barrels. The Federal Trade Commission has recently completed an exhaustive study of the gasoline industry, its report having been laid before Congress on April 2, but the facts are not yet made public.

American Physician Wins Honors. Dr. Harry Platz of Mount Sinai Hospital, New York, who isolated the bacillus of typhus and developed the successful treatment which has been used at all battle fronts to defeat this scourge, has received from the Bulgarian government a medal without swords, the distinction being the highest one possible to award a Bulgarian army surgeon. The medal was bestowed for Dr. Platz's services in aiding in the stamping out of t hus in Serbia and Bulgaria.

Greatest American Dry ock. The city of Boston is now constr ting a dry dock to cost more than $3,00 000, which will be the largest dry dock the western hemisphere. The dock l be 1,200 feet long, with a width the entrance of 133 feet, and depth o the sill at high tide of 45 feet. There l be a special gate in the center divi g it into two sections, so that two ssels of less than half the total length the dock can be dry-docked at once. sing the entire dock, it will be possi e to accommodate the largest vessel yet constructed.

A Fusing Gospel. Out of a otal population of over 5,500,000 in New York City, it is estimated by th New York Evangelistic Committee that 3,300,000 are without church affil ion. It is the special effort of the com ttee in its summer work to carry the spe to these people. It is proposed the campaign during the coming s mer to use 22 tents, 8 halls, 25 shop and 210 open-air Gospel stands. lost nationalities are represented i this great army of the unevangelized The spring meeting of the Evang istic Committee will take place in C egie Hall on April 24, when the pla and purposes for the summer campai will be announced.

The Work of Congress. Co ress during the week ending April was largely taken up with the conside tion of the army and navy pro ms. April 3, an amendment to the Arr Bill proposed by Senator Cummins, p viding for the addition of five offi s of the National Guard to the genera staff of the army, was adopted. On Ma 30, the War Department transmitt to the Senate an estimate showin that there were approximately 234,48 citizens of military age in the ited States now outside of the arm who have had military training. On pril 7, the Senate, by a vote of 36 34, retained in the Army Bill the tion authorizing the organization of a lunteer army along lines similar the Continental Army plan. Tes ying before the Naval Affairs Commi e of the House, Secretary Daniels on arch 31, reiterated his belief that the g ernment should erect an armor plat lant and should be prepared to p luce anything needed for warfare in the ent of private bids being too high. The secretary said: "A good many ople in this country who are for prepar ness are opposed to it at a 112 per ent. profit." The committee was advi l of a proposition by the Bethlehem teel Company, in which it agreed to uce its price for armor plate from $ to $395 a ton for the five-year bu ling program. The five-year progran alls for ships as follows: 10 dreadno hts, 6 battle cruisers, 85 coast subm nes, 15 fleet submarines, 10 scout 50 destroyers, 4 gunboats, 1 hospita hip, 2 ammunition ships, 2 fuel ship and one repair ship. The Bethlehem ompany also agreed to permit a fi of chartered accountants or the F eral Trade Commission to inventory neir plant and make careful estimates the cost of manufacture. With thes ata in hand the company agreed to m the Secretary of the Navy and to agre n a price which he should be satisfie was as low as the government could po bly manufacture on its own account. This proposition marked a complet surrender of the armor plate manufact ers. The clubwomen of the country are ing organized to support the Keating ild Labor Bill, which is now pendi in Congress. co emplating early action. There has be considerable criticism of late re rding the failure of Congress to m e headway on the larger matters ur r consideration. The Senate has pa ed none of the large appropriation bi. The House has yet to pass the su ry civil, rivers and harbors, District of olumbia, agricultural, navy, army ar diplomatic and consular measures. A e from preparedness, the whole A inistration legislative program is st pending, including the Tariff C mission Bill, the Philippine indepe lence measure, the Porto Rico Bill, th esolution for an investigation of the tr sportation problem, the Ship Purch e Bill and conservation measures. B re the House Judiciary Committee o April 4 the beef trust, which was su osed to have been strangled by the Sh man law, was reported as still ex ing. The committee was considering the Borland Resolution providing fo n investigation into the alleged lack of ompetition in the cattle-buying in stry. Various witnesses agreed that th had been no measurable increase in e prices paid for cattle in various ma ets since the outbreak of the Eu pean war, although the advance in pr at retail has been noticeable.

E AMERICAN EXPEDITION INTO M ico. After the action at Guerrero, th various elements of the band there br en up by Colonel Dodd were fol lo d up relentlessly by the American tr ers. The order was “Spare nothing but horseflesh.” A couple of days later Colonel W. C. Brown with a squadron of the Tenth Cavalry surprised a band of Villistas eighteen miles southeast of Bachiniva in the neighborhood of Aguascalientes. The Mexicans, who were a part of the band dispersed at Guerrero, were at siesta with their horses unsaddled. The negro troopers rode into the canyon yelling at the top of their voices, and the Mexicans mounted and opened fire which the troopers returned, killing about thirty Mexicans and capturing forty horses with some equipment. There were about one hundred men engaged on each side, but no Americans were injured. Since the fight at Guerrero, no reliable information regarding the position of Villa himself has been received. Colonel Brown, in a message from Cuchirachio on April 4, said that he was on a “hot trail,” Villa having been reported in the neighborhood of Satevo, 100 miles from Guerrero. Two days later Villa was said to have passed Satevo going toward La Boquilla, about fifty miles from Satevo. From La Boquilla a canyon trail leads directly to Parral, from which place it is about a day's hard riding to the state of Durango. American air scouts reported Villa with some 500 men traveling south, on April 8, somewhere in the Parral region. The exact location was not given. Troops of Colonel Brown's and Colonel Dodd's commands were in close pursuit. Villa was said to be on a litter escorted by 100 men while 400 acted as a rear guard. The severe handling of the Villa bands by the Americans, and a number of more or less conclusive victories by the Carranzistas in other fields, are beginning to influence the adherents of Villa. On April 4 it was announced that General Canuto Reyes, commanding the Villa forces in the neighborhood of Torreon, state of Durango, had offered to surrender with all his forces in return for amnesty. The Carranza commander immediately issued proclamations allowing all bandits ten days in which to give up their horses and saddles. On April 5 a band under command of Simon Reyes attacked the Carranza garrison at Parras, several miles east of Torreon, and was driven off with a loss of forty-two killed and some arms and horses. On April 8 Carranza was still temporizing over the arrangement for the use of the Mexican railways, but the American army, by purchasing large numbers of motor trucks, was still provisioning its troops successfully, although it was said at General Funston's headquarters that if it became necessary to penetrate farther into Mexico the use of the railway from Juarez to Chihuahua and the establishment of a new base in that region would be necessary. Some provisions for the army are being handled over the Mexican railways as commercial business.

NEW AMBASSADOR FROM CHILE. It was announced on April 7 from Santiago, Chile, that Santiago Alunate Bascunan, minister to Italy since 1907, would be appointed ambassador to the United States, succeeding Eduardo Suarez Mujica.

CHINESE REVOLT STILL SPREADING. On April 7 dispatches from Shanghai said that the city of Canton and the province of Kwangtung had on April 6 formally declared themselves independent. No disturbances and no fighting occurred. The population of Kwangtung is estimated at between twenty-five and thirty million, and its defection from the government of Yuan Shi Kai may soon be followed by the defection of other southern provinces. This action strengthens the demand for Yuan's retirement and the restoration of the Nanking constitution. Nanking is reported to be seething with revolutionary feeling, and its secession is looked for.

Crusaders for Peace

“WE are going to tell the truth as we see it to the American people. We are not afraid. W are not afraid of the shafts of ridicu and malice. I have stood in this hall ma times in the atmosphere of relig n, conscious of the divine presence, bu never did men and women gather fo more truly godly purpose than th which has brought us here tonight. It ay be my fate to have all the little I ve ever tried to do blotted out, but I nt it to be remembered that in an ho of madness, in the hour of moral pe , a little company of men and we en stood up and dared to point out to e American people the folly and the ev of their ways. We are going to he lead the American people to the wa of sanity, to the ways of justice on again.”

prompt answer to this prophecy of r. Stephen A. Wise, made at the fir meeting of the anti-preparedness cr de undertaken by the Anti-Prepa dness Committee, at Carnegie Hall, N York City, on April 6, the New Y Times of April 8 declared editoria : “The Socialists and the Pacifists, wh preached the gospel of cowardice at arnegie Hall Thursday night, are to w through the country the seeds of ational degradation and disaster.”

one who was present at the great Ca egie rally could possibly think of ap ying the term “cowards” to the br e men who stood up and declared th purpose and their faith. John Ha es Holmes declared that the blood of her nations would be a greater stain up the American flag than any insults th might be hurled against it. It is sai that the great purpose and obligatio of the government must be to prote the lives of its citizens. War is th vaste of life, the destruction of life. Th e who saw the passionate earnestne of this brave preacher as he pleaded fo he ideals of peace knew that he wo d die gladly for this faith that was in m.

nos Pinchot, in assailing the bill no before the New York Legislature to mpel the boys of the state to receive mi ary training, declared that he wo d resist with force any effort of the sta to take his boy and thrust him int the atmosphere of a military camp. Co ressman Calloway declared: “ en I see a man coming down the str t with a couple of Winchesters, a ace of revolvers, a knife and a pair of nucks,’ I do not put him down for a ave man. I put him down for a br gart, a fool, or a bully.”

Dr. Charles E. Jefferson, who presided at the meeting, bidding godspeed to these peace crusaders on their tour across the country, giving them a message to take from the people of the East to the people of the Middle West, said: “Tell them that the New York dailies do not represent the sentiment of the East.” This is perhaps a sufficient answer to the base charge of cowardice which the New York Times has brought against these heroes of peace.

On the other hand it does not answer the arguments of such men as Stephen S. Wise, Washington Gladden, Scott Nearing, General Isaac R. Sherwood, John Haynes Holmes and Amos Pinchot, to call them cowards.

This anti-preparedness crusade, of which the New York meeting on April 6 was the first, is an answer to the challenge of President Wilson, made on his recent tour, that those who differ with him as to the immediate need of unusual naval and military preparations should “hire large halls” to state their case to the public. The speakers hurried from the Carnegie meeting to take the midnight train to Buffalo, to address a meeting on the following night. The next night they were to speak at Cleveland; the next at Detroit; the next at Chicago; the next at Minneapolis; the next at Des Moines; the next at Kansas City; the next at St. Louis; the next at Cincinnati; the last meeting of the series being held at Pittsburg on April 16. These men undertook this arduous task without compensation, to tell the American people “the truth about preparedness.”

The program of the Carnegie Hall meeting was most remarkable for its wide diversity. A farmer, two labor leaders, a woman, three clergymen, a congressman and a lawyer, differing in some details of their counsels, united in asserting that the present circumstances do not justify a vast increase in our nation's military and naval preparations. The watchword of the meeting was “Democracy against Militarism.”

The meeting was opened by an address by Mrs. Lillian D. Wald, chairman of the Anti-Preparedness Committee.

Dr. Jefferson as chairman of the meeting declared that the audience had assembled to discuss the greatest question that had arisen since the Civil War. “What can we do to cure a sick world,” he asked; “to lead its feet into the paths of peace? What we may decide now will affect the career and destiny not only of the United States, but of the nation at our north, the republics of the south, and tortured Europe. What we do this year will shape our career for the next hundred years.”

Congressman Caloway, of Texas, a member of the Naval Committee of Congress declared that this committee had been taking testimony to find out what we need in this country to protect us, what our protection really is, and that such experts as Admirals Fletcher, Badger, Winterhalter and Grant had declared that in muzzle energy and broadside capacity our navy is equal to that of any nation on earth except England. Mr. Calloway declared that our nation has three lines of defense: first, the Navy; second, the forts; and third, every red-blooded American that loves his country.”

Oscar J. Bolton, of the New York State Federation of Labor, declared that at a recent labor meeting, at which four speeches had been made in favor of preparedness, when the time for the vote came, only five votes were recorded in favor of the movement. John A. McSparran, a youthful, unpretentious, sunny-faced man, won the approval of his audience by saying at the outset: “Ladies and gentlemen, I am a farmer.” He reviewed the deliberations of a number of great gatherings of farmers, under the auspices of the National Grange and the Farmers Union, showing that the farmers of the country were almost unanimous against the preparedness program. He brought down the house by declaring that the preparedness agitation was “of the munitions makers, by the munitions makers, for the munitions makers.”

James H. Maurer, president of the Pennsylvania State Federation of Labor, asked, “Who is it that is in favor of preparedness? It is not the coal miners. They are against it. It is not the farmers. They are against it, as we have just heard. It is not the factory workers or other laborers. It is easy to see that we do not want it. If Congress really wants to give us protection, let it find out who the men are that will profit by war, and corral the whole outfit and lock it up.”

Amos Pinchot wondered at the amazing arguments and statements brought forward by the preparedness advocates. He said that a few weeks before he had listened in this same hall for two hours to the preaching of the doctrine of fear. The speakers seemed to take the position that the United States was practically done for already, so it appeared that there was not much use for arming anyhow. One minister had implied in his address that a few weeks in the Plattsburg Camp would make a capital Christian of any man. Mr. Pinchot spoke of the auspicious circumstances in connection with the Villa raid upon Columbus, which showed that the raid was foreknown by Americans. In the typewritten copies of Mr. Pinchot's address handed to representatives of the press occurred the following vigorous sentence: “Mexico should be invaded, and so should Wall Street, by a corp of reliable secret service agents to find out who is responsible for the pressure and violence that has been stimulated to force our country into war.”

The burden of the addresses was that America is in danger of being clutched in the grip of business interests who are in favor of war. The greatest enthusiasm was roused by Mr. Maurer, Dr. Holmes, and Rabbi Wise, who went farther than their colleagues in their denunciation of all war and their stalwart pleadings for the cause of peace. Dr. Wise sounded a rebuke to the many ministers who have been swept off their feet by the war enthusiasm, characterizing them as “the Christless clergymen of Christendom.”

Names were enrolled of those who would undertake to support the work of the Anti-Preparedness Committee, and a collection taken for the conduct of the propaganda. Dr. Jefferson called upon the speakers to rise, whereupon the audience also rose, and with hearty cheering endorsed his words of confidence, appreciation, hope and good wishes for these brave crusaders in the cause of peace.

AN EASTER SERMON

By Rev. Charles Carroll Albertson, D. D.*

Text John 14: 2 "If it were not so I would have told you."

THERE is no use to dispute it; death seems, in many instances, an absolute calamity. To die in youth, as many do, or in middle age; to leave one's work unfinished, to say good-by to the beauty and bounty of the world, seems nothing less than tragic.

That death is not tragic, not the saddest of all sad things, is clear only when we perceive that death may have a twofold aspect; that what is death in one realm may be birth in another. One fact, one conclusive fact, changes the whole case. That fact Paul summed up thus: "If our earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building of God, a home not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

Immortality, incorruptibility, eternal life, are but various words that stand for the same fact, a fact in the light of which death loses all its terror. Let us be assured of this fact and we shall no longer think of death stoically, bowing proud heads to fate; or reluctantly, as a truant schoolboy thinks of the probation officer; nor yet despairingly; but, if not cheerfully, at least confidently, the heart meeting all doubts of the mind with the assurance, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." Let us be assured of this fact, and when next the "black camel kneels at our tent" we shall not sit and grieve, but with a fond good-by to him that passes out of sight we shall cry, "Speed! fight on! fare forever There as Here."

Jesus' view of the future life is distinctive among the great religious teachers, not so much in the doctrine of immortality itself as in the manner of his teaching it. That which differentiates him from others in this respect is his mental attitude with regard to the future life. He said some things about it, but he said more by what he did not say.

There are two kinds of argument that most of us think too little of. We fall into a way of thinking that the only valid argument is by a process of logical reasoning. We forget that there is an "argument from absence." If a man tells you that a certain stone in an arch is unnecessary, bid him remove it, and if he does remove it, and the arch still looks complete and is complete, bearing the weight it was designed to bear, he was right. But if he removes it, and the arch falls, he was in error. This is "argument from absence," and it amounts to demonstration.

Closely akin to this is the "argument from silence." In law, certain documents are always to be construed in a given way in case there are no provisions to the contrary. That is to say, certain things are assumed, taken for granted, read into the document.

In the commonest affairs of daily life we are accustomed to interpret silence by certain well-known principles of thought. If you have a telegram in the early morning from a friend saying, "I will arrive at ten o'clock," in the absence of other information you will conclude he means at ten o'clock this morning, not ten tonight, nor ten tomorrow. You say, "Of course he means this ten o'clock, the nearest ten o'clock; if it were not so, he would have told me."

You left home for business at eight o'clock. You met your wife at twelve, had luncheon with her, and parted at one. How did you know your house was not robbed an hour after you left this morning? How did you know the children were well when your wife left home? Yet you never even inquired whether burglars had got the silver, or whether measles had got the children! You say, "I knew that all was well, for if it had not been so, she would have told me!" Ah, what an eloquent interpreter of silence you are!

Your boy went to college in September. He had enough money to pay his tuition, buy his text-books, and pay his board a month. Yet he seemed entirely willing to go, trusted you to send him a remittance for his second month when it came, asked for no bond to guarantee his continuance at college. He knew you expected to help him all through college—if it were not so, you would have told him.

Your children had their breakfast this morning. Did they manifest any great anxiety about where the dinner is to come from? They expect you to provide food for them—you know where the provisions are, and where more shall come from when the present supply is exhausted. If it were not so, you would tell them. Even children understand the "argument from silence."

JESUS used just this argument in teaching his disciples. They believed in God. He never reasoned it out with them, but he talked to them about God as if God were. If it were not so, he would have told them. They believed in a future life. He never reasoned that out with them, but he talked to them as if the future life were as certain as the present; as if this earth were but one of many dwelling-places God has provided for his children. He said, "If it were not so, I would have told you."

He spoke of his plans for the future as if all time were his. He talked of centuries, and millenniums, and ages, as we speak of hours, and days, and months. He acted as if death were no more to him than passing into another room. At last they came to take the same view of death. The black specter in their path became a mere shadow. The river dwindled into a mere brooklet to be crossed at a single step. And he let them hold that view of death. We believe it was the true one. If it were not so, he would have told them.

The affirmation of immortality was not new. Socrates and Plato had affirmed it. But they had to argue it, and right well they did so. But the attitude of Jesus, the calm confidence in the unbroken continuity of life, is unique. Jesus had no need to reason out a truth. He possessed truth as an attribute, not as an act.

Our confidence in immortality cannot possibly be founded as Jesus' was, who saw the whole circle of life where we see but a little segment, a broken arc. Like Plato, and like Paul, we must reason out our faith. But do you not see how our confidence may be kindled by his confidence? There was One who like Browning's man "held we sleep to wake." There was One who never doubted. There was One who, knowing what a great bully death is, terrifying men and turning their hours of brightness into hours of gloom, calmly looked on death as if it were an incident in life, an incident like trouble, to be faced courageously, but not to be feared; an incident like pain, to be borne patiently; like doubt, to be dispelled; like sickness, to be cured; like darkness, to be passed through.

Look at Jesus while the shadows of death are gathering around him. Ecclesiastics are seeking his death. Politicians are against him. His friends are few. His enemies are strong and numerous. His ministry has been brief, so brief—he who said he would set up a kingdom and destroy all the works of evil! Yet, with the cross in sight, he speaks as serenely as any king on his way to coronation. "Be of good cheer: I have overcome the world."

Will not his confidence kindle ours? If he could say that on the eve of his death, can we not fare on, all unperturbed by thoughts of the narrow bed under the green, "hoping and assuredly believing," as William Shakespeare wrote in his last will and testament, "to be made partakers of life everlasting"?

I stood on the banks of the Potomac one morning in March. The river was cold, and the air was warm, and a mist rose from the river and concealed the tops of the tallest buildings. I looked at the Washington Monument and it seemed to end two hundred feet above the ground. A stranger would have marked that as the height of the shaft. But I knew it was higher than that. I had ascended it, and it took only a moment's time for my imagination to reconstruct the invisible part of the monument. It was an unbroken shaft even if the major part of it was invisible. That was Jesus' view of life. The mists of death never obscured its unbroken continuity from his view.

Death after all is but a mist, a cloud. They who pass out of our sight pass through the cloud as soldiers do who lead the battle line up the slopes of a mountain. They plant their banners above the clouds. To them the clouds are no barriers. And to us who follow the great Captain of our Salvation, death is no obstacle to our progress. He passed through the cloud unhurt and planted his victorious banner on the immortal height to which he calls us when he bids us follow him.

SURELY the force of the argument for the unbroken continuance of life from Jesus' silence will appeal to us all when we remember that Jesus was an absolutely candid teacher of the truth. He assumed to lead his people into all essential truth. He was under every obligation to disabuse the minds of his disciples of errors into which they had been led by others. And that is exactly what he did. He was constantly correcting their views of things religious. They believed implicitly in the future life. And he never rebuked them for it. He never warned them they were cherishing a false hope. He had been cruel beyond comparison to call them after him to the martyrdom that awaited them, in the belief that the moment of their death was to be the moment of their victory, if he had not himself shared their undying hope. If it were not so, he would have told them.

They may have had their moments of doubt and wavering. He never had. They only hoped. He knew. With all his voluntarily assumed human limitations yet was he conscious of supreme superiority to every chance and change of time. What was time to him? One eternal Now. What was life to him? One uninterrupted line.

And what life was to Jesus it is to all his people, if they only knew. If we knew! If we knew the real insignificance of death we should never again drape our houses in black when our friends pass out. We should never again wear black as emblem of sorrow. We should hang a green wreath on the door, and wear a flower on our breasts, but no black.

And do we not know? Death is the result of organic change. The spirit is not organic. Then what can death do to it? It can release it, that is all.

> "Birthless and deathless and changeless remaineth the spirit forever; > Death hath not touched it at all, dead though the house of it seems."

A traveler may go to sleep at night in the midst of a snowstorm. The last sounds he hears are the furious wind and the dashing sleet. But he awakens in the morning in a land of mild breezes and blue skies. In another day he sees the oranges in bloom and hears the mockingbird make melodious the silver light of dawn. Some day we shall close our eyes on earth and earthly scenes and open them on fields that mock the power of poet's pen or painter's brush. Some day, or, more likely, some night, we shall fall asleep on earth and awaken in the Summer Land, the land of far distances, where faith shall be lost in sight and hope shall have its fruition. Easter is Jesus' pledge that we whose lives are hid with him in God shall never die. If it were not so, he would have told us.

The Far-Off Interest of Tears

SUNDAY, April 23. Ps. 126 : 6. "He that goeth forth, weeping, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him." Here we have the weeping sower and the joyful harvester, and the psalmist unites them in the reach of the same vision. Sad and heavy days are seen in relationship with glad and exuberant days. And the happier conditions are not merely a change from the gloomy conditions; they are a sequence, a consequence, a vital issue, they are related as cause and effect, as seed-time and harvest. A divine "doubtless" is hidden in the process, and promises an inevitable progress and transformation.

Now, no harvest ever comes of just "weeping." Weeping may be only an idle evasion. We are sometimes tempted to allow our tears to satisfy our conscience. We weep over something and then we are snared into assuming that something has been accomplished. Emotion is healthy only when it moves us to action. Without action emotion becomes stale and rancid. We may weep over these harrowing days through which we are passing; we may "water our couch with our tears," and nothing is accomplished. We are to be driven by our emotion to fields that are convulsed and broken by calamity, and in the awful furrows we are to sow our precious seed. For, indeed, the very groundwork of human life is nowadays strangely upheaved. Large fields of life, which have been as hard as iron, are beaten into dust. Hearts which have been callous as a wayside are sorely broken, and ready for the seed. And we are to go forth, weeping, endued with all the gracious, sympathetic tenderness of our Master, and with exquisite carefulness we are to scatter the seed of the kingdom.

What seed can wo sow? There is the precious seed of the absolute dependableness of the holiness of God. Let us sow that seed on the stricken field. There is the precious seed of redeeming love and grace. "Kate," said Professor Elmslie to his wife as he lay dying, "we will tell everybody that God is love!" Let us scatter that seed in the bleeding rents of every riven life. And there is the precious seed of truth about vanquished death and resurrection glory, and the wonders of our eternal home in God. There is an abundance of precious seed. Let us be the sowers of the Lord, and let us go forth, weeping, bearing this precious seed, and we shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing our sheaves with us. J. H. J.

Resting on God's Word

MONDAY, April 24. Isa. 65 : 13-25. "The God of Amen" (margin). Man's word is perhaps. God's word is Amen. His word is truth. Jesus makes the same claim for his words. "Amen! Amen! I say unto you." "These things saith the Amen!" The apostle Paul has a striking echo of these words in II Corinthians: "All the promises of God in him are Yea! and through him also is the Amen." Only in this God of truth and trustworthiness is the real blessedness of life found.

Speaking of this passage, a great preacher has compared men's promises and statements to those snow cornices in the high mountains, which may break when the climber is in the very middle of them, and let him down into destruction; while God's words are the one path across the deepest gulf, which we may tread with absolute safety, knowing that it will never yield beneath our feet. We shall be foolish indeed to rest our happiness alone in the human.

The wise man holds up for our approval the man who swears to his own hurt and changes not. That is what the apostle does in the chapter in II Corinthians already referred to. "As God is faithful," he says, "our word to you was not yea and nay!" Those who are filled with God's Spirit live simply, humbly, transparently, sincerely. Their yea is yea, and their nay is nay; and the time will come when it shall be true of all pure and transparent natures, that the former troubles will be forgotten in the new heavens and earth. F. B. M.

Setting Our Hope in God

TUESDAY, April 25. Ps. 78 : 7. "That they might set their hope in God." No man's life is irreproachable, or so clear of faults that a critic or an enemy may not find weak places in our character or our work, which make our hearts ashamed. It is a great mistake to consider the strength of the Christian as existing chiefly in the perfection of his life or his service. To be sure, the tree should be known by its fruits, and a Christian's life should reflect the characteristics of the Christ. Yet the spring and source of the Christian's hope lies in the consciousness of becoming, even if very slowly, what God is making him to be. His hope is set on God.

Phillips Brooks, in a matchless figure, has represented this thought: "A block of marble or wood, lying alone upon a hill-top, may be ugly and uninteresting. The same block of wood or marble, brought into a sculptor's workshop, though his hands may not have touched it yet, or may have only rudely blocked out its design, may be a thing to reverence, may stir our imagination and our love. And if we may go farther and attribute to the stone or marble block a thought about itself, a conception of its own value, can we not think that as it lies upon the hill-top it may be ready to accept everybody's disesteem—to believe what everybody says about its worthlessness,—but when it comes into the sculptor's hands it may gain such new sense of its capacity under that wise and loving power, that no man's sneer can cloud the pleasure it feels in the new revelation and hope of its true self, which, under those hands, have come to it?"

Some man may come to me and tell me that I am poor and weak and filled with many mistakes. I know it, and I do not need that man should reveal to me my faults, for which I bow my head in penitence. But let me realize that, poor block of humanity as I am, God has chosen me and has already begun to shape his purpose in me. I have felt it as the marble has felt the hand of the sculptor. Then my hope gathers strength, and I have a deep joy to go on—a joy that no man taketh from me. C. S. C.

Saving and Cleansing

WEDNESDAY, April 26. Ex. 17 : 1-7 and I Cor. 10 : 4. "That Rock was Christ." On leaving the seashore and turning inwards toward Sinai, the whole camp, man and beast, became severely pressed. The granite walls of the long defiles reflected an intolerable glare and heat, and the failure of water-supply threatened to drive the whole camp to frenzy. At Marah the water was unpalatable; at Rephidim there was no water at all. The little children were drooping like flowers; the exhausted cattle lay panting on the ground; the scouts, sent out in all directions, reported that there was no trace of water in the neighborhood. The people found fault with Moses, and "tempted" the Lord, doubting him, questioning his love and care, and finally suggesting that he had deserted them. At the bidding of God, Moses st[illegible]ck, and a rush of crystal water gushed [illegible] the dry land, and continued to flow, so that even when they had left the Rock itself far behind in the desert march, the water that flowed from it still supplied their need. This is the undoubted meaning of the apostolic allusion—"They drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them; and that Rock was Christ."

Our Lord is the Rock of Ages! In the cleft of his side we may hide. He is the shadow of a great rock in a weary land. He was smitten for our offenses, bruised for our iniquities! One of the soldiers pierced his side and [illegible] out blood and water. And that blood [illegible] have, so to speak, been flowing forth ever since, following the march of the pilgrim hosts, carrying cleansing and salvation. F. B. M.

The Big Brother

THURSDAY, April 27. Gen. 4 : 9. "Where is Abel thy brother? And he said, I know not; am I my brother's keeper?" The downfall of Cain reached back to the fact that he lacked the consciousness that he was responsible for his brother. He went down beneath the cloud of selfish and self-centered ambition.

In the hour of meditation, it is well to ask ourselves whether we are losing this sense of responsibility for our brother. To succeed, to gain personal ambition, according to the Christian teaching, is not enough. It is necessary to include some one else in our success, to be truly Christian.

One of the fine evidences of the existence of this spirit is seen in the "Big Brother" movement, through which so many hundreds of boys have been lifted out of untoward environments and set upon a course of high manhood, through the genuine interest and association with some Big Brother, some man who has sacrificed time, thought and money to follow out the Biblical injunction. It is doubtful whether any one has been saved or reformed truly in this world by anything but love, and love is the very spring and substance of this Big Brother campaign.

It is a simple but great work. The boy is assigned to a certain Big Brother, a business man, perhaps; introductions are made, and the boy is made to feel that the man is his own friend—not simply a professional almsgiver, or a friend of his parents. The Big Brother helps in securing employment if necessary, arranging for schooling, and most of all by companionship whenever possible. An hour's conversation, a quiet talk at night, a letter, a slight gift, making sure that the boy has right companions—these are the old but the permanent means of showing brotherhood. One of the best-known lawyers in New York has taken on six little brothers. He confesses that he is six times happier, and six times bigger and better, than he was before. Is your life cold and bare? Try to be a Big Brother. There's a boy somewhere needing you, and you need him. C. S. C.

The Fight Against the Flesh

FRIDAY, April 28. Ex. 17 : 8-15. "It came to pass, when Moses held up his hand, that Israel prevailed." Amalek always stands for the sins of the flesh; and Israel represents the church in her warfare against the dark powers that allure men to ruin by dangling before them sensual indulgence.

At the opening of the battle, the great leader was seen by the camp to be ascending a spur of rock, well within view, first standing and then

What Does He Think?

WE wonder what Jesus of Nazareth thinks of the way the world will this year celebrate the anniversary of his triumph over death! In how many hearts, in how many homes, in how many churches, in how many lands, will we feel that Eastertime is really honored and understood? Sometimes it is hard not to fear that he must be so grieved, so shamed, so angered by the actions of the people of this planet that he is almost unwilling to look at us at all. But we know he has not forgotten; we know he has not looked the other way; we know he loves us still. And we know, too, that the agonies of Gethsemane and Golgotha are rending his heart again as they rent it two thousaud years ago.

BECAUSE his church has not been faithful, careful, energetic enough, nearly half the people in the world have never yet heard of him. These millions live on in darkness and fear, under the grip of the forces of nature which impel them to cruelties and crimes. Other millions, who have heard of him, still choose to worship the gods of darkness instead of the God of Light, whose Revealer and Messenger he is. A few of the world's nations have taken his name, proud to call themselves Christian. But most of these are locked in a death grapple at this Eastertime, trying to tear one another to pieces. In the New World, a new nation has arisen with every opportunity to play the part of brother to every other nation. But instead of doing that, the Easter season finds this nation waxing fat and rich at the bloody business of supplying ammunition with which the nations of the other world are seeking to destroy one another. Not only that; he hears from this new and highly favored land the moans of tired, hungry children, forced to spend their infant strength in toil so that greedy men may grow richer than they already are. He hears the wailing of children who are sick and dying because their parents, in this land of gold, can not find the means to keep them well aud strong. He hears the groans of overburdened women, the protests of weary men, one multitude working too hard, another multitude not able to find work at all. He sees in myriads of homes needless poverty and pain. He sees the factories where men and women and children bear the too heavy burdens of labor. He sees the stores and market places and offices in which the serpent of greed squeezes out unjust profits from the products of those who toil. He sees—how many thousand?—women thrust from the pure beauties of true womanhood to lives of deadly shame! He hears the murderous snarl and the senseless jeer of the drunkard; the empty laughter of the idler; the song and jest of those who waste the nation's wealth in pleasure.

Grieved, is he? Yes. Angered, is he? Yes. Disappointed, is he? Yes; bitterly so. But discouraged? Never!

FOR those who seek to understand, the reason is plainer to see this year than it has ever been before, why the hope and love and joy and holiness of Easter have hitherto failed to fill the world. Jesus himself summed it all up long ago when he indignantly asked his hearers: "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not those things which I say?"

What a relief it is to turn from the picture of the world's chaotic wickedness, back to that quiet hillside where he sat down long ago to outline, for those who would listen, a plan of life that would fill the world with peace and good cheer: "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy. Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God. Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled. Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.' It is not enough, he declared, to refrain from killing your brother, you must not hate him, even in a fit of anger. You must not retaliate when he wrongs you. You must not have any enemies. The old idea of loving your neighbor and hating your enemy must come to an end. "I say unto you, love your enemies; bless them that curse you; do good to them that hate you; and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you."

IS the world doing these things? Is this country doing these things? Is the organized church doing them? Is your church doing them? Is your home doing them? Are you doing them?

How then can we hope for an Easter blessing, or how can we believe that Christ will be pleased with our Easter worship? Of more value to him than the Easter sermon, the Easter anthem, the Easter flowers, will be the humble, penitent heart, which shall weep over the failures to obey its Lord, and will determine by his grace henceforth not only to confess his name, but to do his works.

Mary wept as she turned from the empty tomb, and said to the stranger who approached: "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him." Then the stranger spoke, and she knew that it was he himself, come back from the dead to help and comfort her. Many whose tear-wet eyes gaze heavenward this Eastertime, feel that the crimes of men have taken Christ from the world; but it is not so. He stands beside you. He stands at the threshold of your home. He stands at the altar of your church. He walks through the cities and the fields, the market places, the legislative halls, the treasuries of our land. He walks with bowed head through Europe's battlefields. He is the same Jesus—the same yesterday, today and forever.

He will take the hand of every man, every woman, every child, who is willing to follow him. He will make their lives radiant, triumphant, glorious. He will help them to show the world again how to be saved.

A Missionary Congress

DURING the closing days of the present month, a National Missionary Congress will meet in Washington, D. C., at which the foremost living students of missionary problems will tell of present conditions in Gospel work throughout the world. Naturally, the effect of the war on the missions has been very widely discussed. Many workers have been withdrawn from the field temporarily. But the note to be sounded by the approaching congress will not be one of discouragement, but rather of reassurance. Authoritative speakers will tell of spiritual conditions in India, China, Malaysia, South America, Africa and other lands. There will be a recital of recent personal experiences and observations in practically all of the missionary fields, Moslem, Hindu and Buddhist, the whole demonstrating that the opportunity of the Christian world is greater than ever.

The first shock of the great convulsion has passed, and the reaction has come. Robert E. Speer will tell about the Far East; John R. Mott will speak on religious conditions in Europe; Shailer Mathews will talk of present conditions in Japan; Sherwood Eddy will give an account of the hopeful situation in India; while Amos P. Wilder will do the same for China. Mexico and the Near East will not be overlooked. It will thus be altogether an inspiring message which these and many others eminent in the mission field will bring to Christian America. It should give us courage and confidence to go on with undiminished vigor in the work of carrying out the Great Commission.

The Transformation of Woman's Work

IF those who are shouting for "preparedness" were to stop a little and seriously consider what it involves, not only in the direct cost of war, but in the economic and domestic life of a nation, their present attitude would undergo a radical change. Take conditions in Great Britain as an illustration. Possessing unlimited financial resources, Britain is spending $5,000,000,000 a year on the war and has just announced for the coming year the biggest financial budget the world has ever known. In the new budget, the increase in taxation will bear heavily upon the common people. Incomes up to $5,000 will be taxed 11 to 12 per cent., those over $5,000, 25 per cent., while still larger incomes affected by the supertax will pay as high as 34 per cent. Practically every article classed among the necessaries of life is now taxed to the utmost point. Food of all kinds, clothing, liquors and tobacco, theater and railroad tickets, and even tickets to the "movies," are all to be taxed in an increased ratio, in order that the govern may be able to carry on the war, and that it may its own expenses and lend money to its allies In France, Germany, Russia, Austria and Italy ation is proportionately heavy.

These new and oppressive burdens have nat ally produced a great change in the condition of wo anhood in all the European countries. With a very rge proportion of the adult males in active military rvice, it has fallen to the women, besides condu ing the ordinary affairs of the household, to perfor the labor of the farm, the shop, the mechanic's b ch, and many other industries formerly conducted by nen exclusively. Women are serving as letter-car rs, policemen, ticket-sellers, gardeners, blacksmiths cab and truck drivers, chauffeurs and street-swe rs. They are doing the major part of the home ho tal work, and thousands have taken the places of m in the great munition plants, filling the shells and cking the fuses. England has 195,000 women mployed on munitions alone, and a similar cond ion prevails in other countries. France is substit ing women in place of the soldiers in garrisons, so hat the men may be released for duty at the nt. Germany has 900,000 women doing work which ess than two years ago was performed by men.

But while life has become far more strenuou nd laborious for women, owing to the changed condi ns, the new and unforeseen development is accept in a brave spirit everywhere. There is no lament ion over the hardships to the "tender sex." But the question is already being asked what the resu of the new relation of womanhood to the world' activities will be—whether the women will be sat ied to go back to the old home life and the old voca ns. Having once tasted the sweets of equality, will ey not desire to continue, even in the face of ph cal obstacles and unwonted hardships? But, after , it is in the homes that the keenest struggle unde he new conditions must be felt. With reduced inc nes and a universal advance in all the necessaries o fe, ranging from one hundred to three and even our hundred per cent., life in European households thout number has become a hard, and for the ti at least a hopeless, problem.

"Preparedness" may not be war, but it is its n of kin, and the "preparedness" of which we he so much in the newspapers and at public gath ngs where the war spirit breaks loose is capable of m ng American home life a series of hardships that can nly be regarded as vicious and unjustifiable, be les being unnecessary from any rational point of w.

The Lost Leaves

AN imaginative magazine writer has rec tly published an article which, whether rega ed as an allegory or otherwise, is neverth ess remarkable for the spiritual lesson it tea es. Between the hours of darkness and dawn he wa ed in a leading fashionable thoroughfare of the me opolis, which was silent and deserted. The air se ed to be filled with strands of mist which, on close observation, appeared to be like leaves blown abo by the night wind. He caught one of these semi-vis les with his hand and found it soft and yielding. N rer inspection showed it to be about the size of a n's palm. In the silence of the street he fancied he ald hear sounds, inarticulate at first; but on holdin he object to his ear, the sounds became like actual sp ch. Then it was impressed upon him that the thir he held was a soul. Strangely enough, it was capal of making either real or imagined responses to his vn thoughts. Looking upward, he found that a li of these fluttering objects extended far down he avenue, seemingly in slow procession, while till farther overhead another line was moving in he opposite direction. He weirdly goes on to relate ow he found that these souls, invisible by day, ere ceaselessly in motion near their former habitat ere all their interests had lain when they were li ng, sentient human beings. They were the souls of w dly-minded, pleasure-loving folk who, having no i ls, had devoted themselves to mere material th gs, and were destined to cling to their old surround gs. It was only a hallucination of the senses—a fre of the imagination. Yet how true it is that those ho have no ideals of sacrifice, of consecration, of hel lness and loving service, to lift them out of the r of ordinary life, with its selfishness and its blindne to spiritual things, must find themselves sadly unf ed for the great change which death brings; just as se poor souls, tossed about by the night wind, f nd themselves in an environment from which they ld not escape. They were reaping what they had s n.

We may learn much from parables. If the sto of the Lost Leaves illustrates any spiritual truth, is that we should begin here and now to live as we pe to live forever. But ideals will not avail unless ey lead us to follow Him who brought life and im ortality to light, and who is himself the "light of he world."

Boys Build Good Roads

MANSFIELD, Mo., a town of 500 people near the heart of the Ozark Mountains, has a boys' good roads club ich is of some account. The mayor the town started the club with fifty s, who began work some time ago good earnest. The town took a holi- , the stores closed, and the men t out into the country with the boys help them in the work. The town ed $20,000 in bonds to continue the d work of road-building into Mans- d, the county seat. Later the boys, forced by the men, went out into the ntry again. The boys picked and led more than 200 loads of rock for face mending and building a culvert. ms were set to hauling gravel from beds, and a decent road was built one day's time. Mayor Riley says s spring the club will be increased a hundred members, and that the blem of permanent roads for the ghborhood will be solved. It is ly that the spirit will be contagious, that other boys' clubs for road- lding will be organized in that part he state. This is an excellent lesson patriotism to teach the boys and ng men to do something practical the public good. That minister wise who sets his boys and young n to work in the church for their own elopment, and for the building up the Kingdom. This is the class, so portant and highly appreciated, thus ressed by the apostle: "I have writ- unto you, young men, because ye are strong, and the word of God abideth in you." (I John 2:14.)

Life of Spring out of Death of Winter

THE eternal God teaches his children a lesson on the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the body in the life of spring which he brings out of the death of winter. When the frost of the autumn cuts down the growths in the gardens and kills the leaves on the trees, and the snow is spread like one broad white marble slab as a tombstone over the grave, nature seems dead and buried. But Nature is not dead, only asleep, and preparing all the time in her sleep for the awakening in the morning. Nature only appears to be dead in winter. Death seems to be the law of nature, but life really is. "The universe is life, there are no dead." With man, death is only apparent. It is only the winter, to be followed by the spring. The tomb is not the terminal, only the tunnel through which we pass out of this into another life, out of the earthly into the heavenly city The homely, loathsome grub dying to become the beautiful butterfly to sip the flowers and wing the air, winter dying that spring may arise out of it, are only analogies of the resurrection of the body, not arguments for it. We may imagine, we may hope on the subject, but the only reason we know anything certain about immortality is that Christ has told us about it. And the only certain argument for the resurrection of the body is that Christ arose from the dead as a pledge that our bodies shall be raised. The attempt of late years to abolish the supernatural has weakened the faith of many in the doctrine of the resurrection. This is all wrong. No teaching of the Scripture is more unequivocal. There is tremendous power to the individual heart, the pulpit, and the general church in a firm faith in the resurrection of the body as the result of a resurrected soul from the death of winter into the life of spring. "But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept." (I Cor. 15:20.)

Indians' Rights Disputed

THE Supreme Court of the United States is to be asked to decide whether the Seneca Indians of New York may spear fish within the boundaries of their old domain, which was granted to Robert Morris by the Treaty of the Big Tree in 1797. The question arises out of the efforts of the state authorities to enforce the laws regulating the taking of fish in the waters of the state. The case for the Indians will be presented for the United States, which is defending the Big Tree Treaty, by Assistant Attorney General Warren. He takes the ground that treaties with Indians are the supreme law of the land, and that the Federal Constitution nowhere takes account of police laws of states as opposed to treaties. They did not have stringent fish and game laws in olden times. They caught fish of any size and any number and at any time in the year that suited them. The people of Palestine sometimes caught fish with a line and a single hook of thorn or ivory, but their usual method was to catch them with a net. "And when they had this done, they inclosed a great multitude of fishes, and their net brake." (Luke 5:6.)

Risks Life for Ring

AFTER Samuel Solicowitz had been rescued from drowning in South Lake, Central Park, New York, the other afternoon, it was observed that he held his jaws so tightly clamped that he could not speak. When he had been thawed out and was warm he had to take a diamond ring from his mouth before he could tell who he was or what had tempted him out on the ice. About one hundred feet out on the ice Samuel saw something sparkle in the sun, and he ventured out. He found a costly diamond ring probably lost by a skater. He got the jewel and was on his way back when the ice gave way and he went into the water over his head and was drowning when his cries brought aid. How many people risk their souls to get silver, gold and precious stones! Some earthly treasures are on rotten ice, and those who venture too far fall through it. The gaining of wealth at the risk of moral danger Christ bitterly condemns in the parable. "What shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul." (Mark 8:36.)

Faithful Service

AT the recent celebration of the diamond jubilee of the Sunday school of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church of New York, the following tribute was paid to the late Mrs. John D. Rockefeller: "For more than fifteen years Mrs. Rockefeller sustained a remarkable relationship as teacher and friend to a large number of boys. After ill health compelled her to relinquish the work of teacher, the part of friend was most faithfully continued. Members of her class now in the prime of life, and scattered widely over the world, remember with deepest gratitude her personal service to them, and trace not only their religious education but much of their success in life to that strong and gracious influence which was and ever is with them." The distinction of being the wife of one of the richest men in the world is trifling as compared with this tribute to this faithful teacher of Bible truth in the Sunday school. There are women of wealth and culture as well as those in humbler circumstances who teach in the Sunday school, and who realize what an opportunity they have to work for their Lord, and the immortality of their influence. The demands for competent, consecrated Sunday school teachers is greater than the supply, and the church should listen to these words of Christ: "Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth laborers into his harvest." (Matt. 9:38.)

Tree Seed Splits Boulder

ROCKS have cracks in them made by the action of the weather. In these seams rootlets of plants find their nest and nourishment. Often seeds of trees blown by the wind or dropped by the birds find lodgment in these cracks and by their growth cleave the huge rocks apart as certainly if not as suddenly as dynamite. The American Forestry has a picture of a huge granite boulder broken in two by a tree which grew from a tiny seed. There is power in life, in that of the elephant, in the human brain cells which can produce millions of horsepower, and in the soul of man which grows and advances, and achieves immortal results. The single little seed in California that started a thousand years ago is busy still with the monster tree. All these types of life point to the Supreme Force, which is God, and to Christ, who is love, the supreme force in the divine mind, who is thus referred to as an eternal potentiality: "Who is made not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life." (Heb. 7:16.)

Diamonds Made by Chemistry

GENEVA, Switzerland, cables that it has been able by chemical process to make the synthetic diamond long sought by science, and claims that it is first in the discovery. This is a mistake, as science has for many years by chemical process produced crystallized carbon, which is diamond. But the specimens were too small to be of practical value. The scientists will wait to see how large, or pure, or cheap these stones can be made for the purposes of useful arts, or to satisfy the empty vanity of society. Right thoughts, pure sentiments, holy deeds, are the divine chemistry with which the jewels of Christian character are made, and place one in the distinguished company thus referred to: "And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels." (Mal. 3:17.)

Old Age Pension Limit Lowered

THE limit for old age pensions in Germany has been seventy years. It is being reduced to sixty-five years by a bill submitted to the German Federal Council. This provision follows out lines indicated by the Reichstag, which on January 15 unanimously voted in favor of the lower age limit. The priceless pension of old age is the spiritual treasure with which God's Holy Spirit endows his aged saints. It is pretty close to heaven when grandpa and grandma read the Bible and pray and behold through their tears the faces of their loved ones looking down upon them from the upper palace windows, realizing this prophecy: "And even to your old age I am he, and even to hoar hairs will I carry you: I have made, and I will bear; even I will carry, and will deliver you." (Isa. 46:4.)

NAMELESS OBLIVION

"THE BOTTLE"—IX.

Mr. John Worth,
Vice-President, The Firmer Co.

Dear Sir: In the pocket of a man who died yesterday of delirium tremens, we found some very soiled and tattered letters. They were from you. We enclose them.

He seems to have no relatives, and no other friend but you.

Do you wish to have him decently buried, or shall we send him to the potter's field?

Let us know immediately.

Truly yours,
Silas Sloane,
Supt. City Morgue.

The Kenai Peninsula

Continuing Frank G. Carpenter's Alaska Story

Copyrighted 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

FOR the past week I have been traveling over the Kenai Peninsula. It is the first patch of our big territory to be opened by the new railway, and it is destined to be one of the thickly settled states of the Alaska of the future. I say states. The time will come when Alaska will be divided. It will have its own states and territories. Each district will have its local industries, its own interests and its own population. I have already shown how southeastern Alaska, a country as big as South Carolina, is already discussing the possibility of breaking away and managing its affairs as an independent political entity. It wants a governor, a legislature and officials of its own who shall have nothing to do with the rest of Alaska. The same will eventually be true of the Tanana Valley, of the Yukon Valley and of the Kuskokwim region. Seward Peninsula will some time be a territory, and so will the Aleutian Islands and the Alaskan Peninsula. Another great territory of the future will be the arctic province north of the Rocky Mountains. This contains 150,000 square miles, having an area of more than three times that of the state of New York. But all this is for the far future. The Kenai Peninsula is a land of the living present.

Suppose you had a country one-fifth again as large as Massachusetts and as wild and as virgin as Massachusetts was when the Pilgrims first landed. Suppose it had as much good land as Massachusetts, that it had warmer winters and cooler summers and that the rainfall was sufficient to raise hardy crops. Suppose the country was one of surpassing beauty; that it had rivers and lakes and beautiful valleys, with mountains equal to the Alps in their grandeur and with glaciers surpassing any known to the continent of Europe. Let the country be one of big game, of moose, bear and deer, of wild fowl of all kinds and of fish without number. Suppose that this country was to be cut by a government railroad running through it from one end to the other, and was to be connected by fast steamers with some of the busiest United States ports. Wouldn't you want to know more about it?

Well, I can tell you something, but not a great deal. I have crossed the peninsula from Resurrection Bay to Turnagain Arm within the past seven days. I started at Seward and went as far as Mile 29 on the Alaska Northern Railway. I there took horses and crossed the mountains over the Moose Pass, and am now at the little mining camp of Sunrise, not far from the eastern end of the Turnagain Arm. Much of my journey has been on foot, and I have not seen a dozen people while on the way. The peninsula is almost uninhabited. The country has hardly been prospected, and there are parts of the interior that have never been trodden by the foot of a white man. My trip was over some of the best-worn trails, and the information I have concerning the rest of the peninsula comes from the recent explorations of our government scien ts, from the miners and prospectors I have met, and om the engineers, geologists and agriculturists who ve been gathering information in connection with he opening up of the peninsula by the new railroad.

If you will take your map of Alaska you wi ee where the place lies. The Kenai Peninsula is i he heart of the south-central coast, a great body of nd that hangs down, as it were, from the coast range to the Pacific Ocean. It is bounded on the east by P ce William Sound, and on the west by Cook Inlet, m which, at the north, Turnagain Arm extends far to the land. It is only about ten miles or so from he end of Turnagain Arm across the country to o of the inlets of Prince William Sound, and the e of that arm is almost directly north of Resurrection y, on which Seward is situated. The Alaska Nort rn Railroad, which the government has bought, con ts these two points. The total length of the peni la from northeast to southwest is about 150 miles, d its width in places is from fifty to seventy-five n s. It is seventy-one miles along the line of the rail d from Seward to Turnagain Arm. The peninsula as altogether an area of 9,500 miles, being of just a ut the size of Vermont.

At Seward you are in the heart of the Kenai M n-tains. This range is about as high as the Allegha s, with some peaks that pierce the clouds above he altitude of Mount Washington. Many of them re s w-capped and some have magnificent glaciers. T re are a half-dozen glaciers in sight of the harbor o Seward, and one sees many others on his way north b railroad.

I WISH I could take you over the railroad from Seward north to Kenai Lake. It is one of the w der rides of the world. You go up the valley w ch ends in Resurrection Bay amid the most m gnificent of mountains. The mountains begin ri t at the sea. It is as though Switzerland came d n to the ocean, and you could ride under its g iers and snows through valleys and hillsides of the g nest of green. There are rushing streams and w ding lakes. There are great canyons and forest-cl cliffs. There are open parks made by nature and in hem ferns and wild flowers and grass as high as y r waist. The trees on the hillsides are largely sp ce and the ozonic air of Alaska carries the sweet s ll of the pines into your lungs.

he first body of water on the way is Bear Lake. T s is about a mile and a alf long and a mile w . It is filled with fi and it is said the g ernment intends to e blish there a fish h hery and experi-m tal farm. The lo-c on is ideal. It is o six miles from Sew-a and is in the midst o natural park sur-r ded by snow-capped m ntains, on the sides o hich hang glaciers of s phire amid forests of e rald. The place is n in the wilds. In the fu re it will have an a mobile road into S ard, and one can th go back and forth in quarter of an hour. T t region is now k wn as Woodrow P k. It has been n ed after the Presi-de .

oing on to the north-w l, you pass little h esteads which have b n cut out of the w ds. They are few a far between, and the p hes of cultivation a kitchen gardens in si At Mile 12 I saw an a ndoned log cabin and w told that it had been o pied last summer by so e city chaps who had c e there to hunt. T y had expected to stay a week or ten days, but th remained more than two months. Nevertheless, th r actual cash outlay for food during that time was le than $10. They spent $5 for flour, potatoes and c e, and the rest of their food was the fish, game a berries they found in the woods.

e stopped for a time at Kenai Lake and then rode al g its shores for four or five miles. The lake begins at lile 19 and it winds about through the mountains fo length of twenty-seven miles. It is a mile or so w , and no one knows how deep. Soundings have b made to 1,350 feet below the surface and the b om not reached. The lake is as clear as crystal, a it mirrors its surroundings.

little farther on is Trail Lake, which I should say is ght or ten miles in length and which, like Kenai L e, is full of salmon-trout, bass and grayling. The sa on-trout of Kenai are caught by the thousand and d d for dog feed. They sell for 8 cents a pound.

was at Mile 29 that I left the railroad and took h es to go across country to Sunrise. At that place is scar Christiansen's roadhouse. Oscar is a wily Swede who has a half dozen horses, which he rents out for all that the traffic will bear. He charged me $16 a day for two horses and guide, and told me that I could pick up the guide on the way. I picked him up long after dark, and we had a terrible time finding the trails. Before leaving I dined at the roadhouse. The meal was moose meat or Alaska beef cooked over the coals by a six-foot pioneer.

LEAVING the roadhouse, I started out through the forest and spent the better part of two days in getting to Sunrise. The horses were fairly good, but the saddles were excruciating. I am accustomed to riding. I cover about fifteen hundred miles every winter in the parks about Washington city, and usually ride ten or fifteen miles every day. I have an English saddle, and can be on a horse for hours without tiring. It was different in this ride across Kenai. Our horses were broadbacked Percherons, and the saddles were a high-pommeled variety, so made that they threw one far to the front. It was like sitting on a sawbuck with ill-fitting stirrups. It brought an entire new set of muscles into play and gave me the sensations and pains of the man who takes a long ride for the first time. I found it impossible to go off a walk, and when we came to a mining camp, after fifteen hours in the saddle, I was so stiff that I had to be lifted from the horse. The next day I walked part of the way and had to be lifted off and on to the horse whenever I rode.

I despair of making you see the wonderful beauties of the peninsula. The trip was through one little valley after another, with the grandest of mountains everywhere in sight. The valleys are from a half mile to three miles in width and are like great natural parks. They are often covered with woods, but the forest fires have cleared open spaces, and it is easy to see that the whole could be turned into farms. In going through the valley I wound my way along rushing streams, in which great red salmon were battling against the current, making their way over the rocks and through the débris of dead trees and floating brushwood. These salmon were the color of beefsteak, and they looked like streaks of raw meat flying along through the water. The streams were of the clearest crystal, and here and there they made waterfalls as they dashed down the hills.

In other parts of the journey I skirted beautiful lakes so clear that the mighty mountains above them, with their wonderful vegetation and curious outlines, were reflected as though in a looking glass. I wish I could have photographed the colors.

And then the live things we saw on the journey! I already have spoken of the salmon. We could see the trout in the streams, and I am told that all are full of grayling and other fine fish. Now and then during the journey I started up coveys of grouse. Some of the birds were as big as a chicken. They ran along in front of my horse for hundreds of feet like so many turkeys. They did not seem to be much afraid, and it was as though I were driving them. I saw also ptarmigan, and at a cabin at Mile 14, where I stopped for dinner, a miner cooked for me some ptarmigan he had just killed.

LATER on I saw the tracks of brown bear here and there on the trail, and once or twice scared up porcupines, which scuttled away through the grass. My guide told me to be careful not to ride over a porcupine, saying that the animal is sure to lame the horses if stepped on. The porcupine shoots its quills into the flesh at such times, and if not pulled out at once the horse soon becomes unfit for travel. The "porky" will shoot its quills into a man if he stumbles upon it in walking, and if the quills are not pulled out they are liable to work their way through the flesh into one's body.

The Kenai Peninsula has some of the best moose pastures of Alaska. It has hundreds of moose, and the moose are increasing in number notwithstanding the hunters, who come here to shoot big game and carry home the antlers as trophies. It is no trouble to get deer or moose horns in this part of the world. I have seen moose antlers that measure sixty-six inches between the tips of the horns, and have had myself photographed with them to show what a mighty Nimrod I am. I will not say who killed the moose.

The most of the food used here comes from the wilds. It can be had for the taking, and this makes the cost of living comparatively cheap. On my way north over the railway I rode with a miner who told me that he and his partner had fed well for two weeks on $1.80 worth of flour and bacon, in addition to the fish and game they had caught. During that time they covered about twenty-five square miles looking for gold, and nowhere were they unable to get ptarmigan and fresh mountain trout. I met them later on the trail. They had packs on their backs, and were moving along at the rate of four miles per hour. As I passed them they offered me a grouse for my supper, saying they had already killed fourteen, and had taken a big trout from Trail Lake. This was enough meat for the two for a week, and it was all caught within three hours.

Gospel Work in War Prison Camps

TWO very interesting letters have just been received by Professor F z Zeller of Bloomfield, N. J., a m ber of the American Committee fo Gospel Work among European War P oners. These letters give a glimpse of he practical work that is already b n, and show that the opportunity is en for a great spiritual harvest in al he prison camps.

ne of the letters is from the Rev. F. Weinstein, pastor of the Moravian c ch at Stettin, in which the writer sa :

Our Moravian Church already car-ri on in several prison camps a pastoral w k among the Russian prisoners. In his work especially Brother August Weber, who is dear to me, and with whom I am intimately acquainted, participates. Starting from Danzig, he officially visits all the prison camps of West Prussia, and does pastoral work in the Russian and Esthonian languages. Pastor Weber formerly held an appointment in Dorpat.

"In Pomerania near Stettin, at Altdamm and at Stargard, we have larger prison camps, where there are many Russians. To many of these prisoners the opportunity is given to earn something, under supervision, on the larger farms.

"Pastor August Weber has got permission from the authorities in West Prussia to visit the prison camps, and enjoys, if I mistake not, the right of free passage on the railroads for such visits.

"As the authorities show a most kindly attitude toward such work, there is nothing to prevent Pastor Weber or myself from doing such work. Personally, I am not able to speak the Russian or Esthonian language, but Pastor Weber is an eminently suitable man, as he speaks them fluently."

The other letter, which concerns the Russian prisoners in Württemberg, is given below. It is from Dr. Frieder Zeller of Württemberg.

"Münsingen Commissariat, March 5.

"My dear Franz: I have always hoped to meet the lieutenant in charge of the prisoners. Russian prisoners with us in Württemberg are found in Münsingen and Ulm, and also in Eglosheim (near Ludwigsburg). Services are not held for them—at least not here (but perhaps in other camps)—as no minister preaches in their languages.

"Good Gospel printed matter, after due previous inquiry or after notification, is received by the commanders of the respective prison camps and distributed among the men."

All contributions in aid of the spiritual work in the European prison camps should be addressed to the War Prisoners Gospel Fund, care of the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.

Scenes in Passion Week as Portrayed by Great Artists

FOR the most part, great paintings of Biblical scenes, especially those depicting incidents in the life of Christ, have been executed with such reverence and sympathy that they have become a real help in our understanding and appreciation of the Scripture story. The selections reproduced here from black and white high-grade photographs of the originals include some of the best-known and most popular of such works. In the picture shown at the right, "Christ in Gethsemane," the artist, Heinrich Johann Michael Ferdinand Hofmann, has placed upon the canvas a sense of human strength and dignity often missed in pictures of Jesus. The somberness and the solitude of that dread hour are not lessened by the representation of the three sleeping disciples, yet the sense of contact with heavenly influences is projected into the scene by the ray which lightens the Saviour's face.

Below, the picture of The Last Supper (much less familiar than the celebrated painting by Da Vinci), is so filled with human atmosphere in the postures and expressions of the Master and his disciples at the moment when Judas goes out into the night, that its prolonged study will be full of profit. This painting was made in 1870 by the German artist, Karl Franz Eduard von Gebhardt

"THEN Jesus, six days before the Passover, came to Bethany, where Lazarus was which had been dead, and whom he raised from the dead. There they made him a supper; and Martha served."

The French artist, Eugène Burnand, has not attempted in the "Repose of Christ" to depict the actual supper which is mentioned in three of the Gospels, and at which Mary, the sister of Martha, anointed the feet of Jesus with the ointment of spikenard, very costly. He seems rather to have chosen a more private moment of the stay of the Master in this home to which he loved to repair. Martha, ever busy at hospitality, and Mary, concerned about higher things, are characteristically portrayed.

In the picture below, the same artist shows the Saviour at the moment of his prayer almost at the end of the Passion Week, when, after the supper, he had warned the eleven disciples that they should be scattered every man to his own, and should leave him alone; and yet not alone because the Father was with him. In the world they would have tribulation, but were to be of good cheer, for he had already overcome the world. Then, "He lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, 'Father, the hour is come.' "

THE Hungarian painter, Mihaly Munkacsy, has endeared himself to every lover of art as well as to every Christian by his masterly painting, "Christ Before Pilate." It seems safe to say that this portraiture of Christ has been the most widely accepted of any as meeting the ideal of the human form of the Man of Sorrows. This painting is rich in character drawing, and it has the great value of being most accurate in detail of costume and environment.

This other painting by the same artist, while by no means so well known and probably never to be as popular as the above, is nevertheless of almost equal interest because of its completeness of detail, and the wonderful feeling throughout. Those who but a short space before were demanding that Pilate "Crucify him, crucify him!" are now wagging their heads and derisively saying, "He saved others, himself he cannot save. If he be the Christ, the Son of the Blessed, let him now come down from the cross." Much of the narrative can be seen in this picture, and yet if one were to attempt to say upon just what point in the story the artist's thought was centered, perhaps the best suggestion would be that moment when to the beloved apostle standing utterly bewildered near the cross, the dying Saviour had said, "Son, behold thy mother."

THE uppermost picture, "The Return from Calvary," by Herbert Schmalz, is one of many beautiful attempts to supplement the Gospel narrative by pictorial suggestion. The almost fainting figure of the mother of Jesus in the foreground, supported by John and a friend and followed by other of "the women," the curious and unmoved watcher at the turn of the steps, the returning crowds seen along the street of the darkening city, and on the brow of a green hill far away outside the city wall, the forsaken crosses black against the amazed sky, make a picture that has become one of the permanent art treasures of the Christian world.

Small wonder, when the eyes of Cleopas and of his companion in the journey to Emmaus were opened and they knew who it was who had joined them on the way, that their amazement should know no bounds. This greatly interesting picture of that moment, by Rudolf Eichstaedt, is to a degree idealistic and yet full of the atmosphere of reality and precious with spiritual influence.

The Christian world is indebted to the French artist William Adolphe Bouguereau for this thoroughly human picture of the women who, upon the first day of the week, very early in the morning, came to the sepulcher bringing the spices which they had prepared. But they found the stone rolled away from the sepulcher, and an angel within the empty tomb greeted them with that first Easter paean, which has echoed and reechoed through the centuries: "He is risen. Why seek the living among the dead? He is not here. Go, tell the disciples, He is risen from the dead!"

A Lily of Easter Day

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

THEY called her the Easter Lady, even when it wasn't Easter, because she looked so very much like a lily. Her face was wte and soft like the petals of the fler (except her lips—they were as pk as Rosa's coral necklace), and her hds were white, too. Her hair was yow as the heart of a lily when the s shines on it, and she very often we green gowns. Awfully simple-lking dresses they were, but I've hrd that the simplest dresses someties cost the most money. I don't kw—men aren't supposed to know wt dresses cost.

's queer how some people stir the iragination. I've known girls, beauties t that I never thought about—even wn I was talking to them; but the fi time I saw the Easter Lady coming dn the street I felt that something raer wonderful had come into my life. T of the kiddies that haunt the settle-mt house were talking to me, and they s that I wasn't listening. Children a quick to notice those things—espe-ciy East Side children.

Who is she?" I asked them.

Oh," said Rosa—a little black-eyed Itian girl—"oh, that's the Easter Ly." And then she added (for Rosa is feminine as any little lady on Fifth Anue), "That's a grand hat, ain't it?"

hadn't noticed the hat, but I ad-mted that it was.

st then the Easter Lady passed us, w a smile for the children. I had a r that she might pass out of my life t way, but she didn't, for Emmy—t little German child who is Rosa's s low—clutched at her dress.

May I smell your hankie, Easter Ly?" she asked.

he Easter Lady stopped short and bhed, and I felt myself blushing, too. I rambled up from the step and wished vely that I had a hat on so that I cd take it off. And then with a laugh li liquid sunlight the Easter Lady ped a fluffy soft bit of white linen fr her sleeve and handed it to Emmy.

Why, certainly, honey child," she s softly, and I caught the perfume of wd violets. It brought a bit of damp, gn shadow-splashed meadowland be-f my eyes, and I forgot the city and t slums.

osa is great on ceremony. The Ital-ia children seem to be—very often.

Easter Lady," she said magnifi-ctly, "this is Meestair" (she never c say her Misters without drawling) "eestair Harwood. He lives here."

was a queer introduction, but the Eter Lady put one of her white hands iine. It was a very soft hand.

The children know me," she said w another of her sunshiny laughs, "d they love the perfume that I use. Tt's why they want my handker-cf."

Is that why they call you the Easter Ly?" I questioned rather boldly, "stead of anything else?"

I don't know why they call me the Eter Lady," she answered, "but they d't know my real name."

didn't either, but she made no at-tpt to tell me.

s she walked down the street, away fr me, I knew that something very wderful had come into my life. And a watched her green gown disappear and the corner, I felt as if spring had ge away and winter had come back.

I SAW her often after that. About very other day I'd see her some-wre on the street, treating the kiddies toky-poky, or talking to some city msionary. And after she'd go away tard her home—wherever that was—I' question the ones she'd been talking to. But none of them seemed to know who she was, and they all called her the Easter Lady. Somehow I got to thinking that she must be one of the really rich women from uptown. It was her manner and her clothes, and her secret sort of way about where she lived. When I'd come to the conclusion that she was rich, I decided that I had better not see her any more. When one lives on the salary of a settlement-house teacher . . . well——

But even though I tried not to see her, I couldn't help it. She had a way of appearing around corners unexpectedly, and whenever a stray sunbeam danced down the street she came in its wake, a white and gold lily dressed in an artfully simple green frock. Finally I asked her point blank what her name was.

"Does it matter?" she answered me. 'Does it?"

Hyacinth Bells

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

IT'S Easter time and hyacinths are growin' in our yard;
They're makin' it a lovely angel place;
For some of them are blue as sky, and some of them are white,
And some ore pink as any baby face.
Seems like they must be happy for they're shaped the same as bells,
And when I lean right close I hear them say,
"The spring is here with sunshine, ond the grass is turning green,
And winter's ice and snow have gone away!"

THE sweetest of our hyacinths we've taken from our yard,
And planted 'em in flower-pots of brown.
And now we think we'll plant them in a heavy pasteboord box.
And send them to the far-off, crowded town.
They don't know where they're goin' but they ring their little bells,
And when I lean right close they seem to say,
"We'll take our beauty with us and our fragrance and our joy,
For Spring is here and winter's gone to stay!"

OUR hyacinths are goin' to the churches ond the sick,
They're goin' to the folks in want and pain—
I hope they'll bring the brightness of our glowing garden spot,
The glodness of the sunlight after rain.
I know they'll make folks happy—for I'm leanin' awful near,
And oh! they ring their bells ond seem to say,
"Be glad, be glad at Easter time, O people of the earth,
For Jesus Christ, the Lord, is ris'n today!"

And, like a foolish boy, I stammered: "Easter Lady, nothing in the world matters—but you."

And then she blushed, and I blushed, and she turned and hurried down the street.

JUST to be beautiful and do good—just to give beauty and light—that seemed to be the Easter Lady's profession. She didn't work, for one saw her at all times. In the middle of the morning and very late on afternoons, but never in the evening. I began to wonder what she did in the evenings, and I began to read the society columns of the evening papers for that reason. I thought perhaps I'd see her picture with a note saying that she had given a musicale or a reception—I feared that some time I'd see a note saying that she was engaged—or married.

But I never found her picture.

ONE day I came upon the Easter Lady in our little assembly hall, singing. Her voice was like her laughter—happy and sunshiny and full of the color of springtime. There was the usual group of children standing around her with wide, adoring eyes, and as I watched she stopped suddenly in her song and snatched the tiniest one to her breast and kissed his dirty little cheek. It was a long time since I'd wanted to be a dirty-faced boy, but——

"Easter Lady," I said, coming up from the back of the room, "where did you learn to sing?"

She looked at me for a moment, and as she looked, for the first time I saw a gleam of sadness, of coldness, in her eyes.

"Does it matter, Mr. Harwood," she questioned, "where I learned to sing—as long as I do sing?"

And again I blushed like a foolish boy, and answered:

"Nothing matters, Easter Lady, as long as you do sing—and I may listen." And then I asked her to sing in our little chapel on Sundays; and she looked surprised and a bit scared for a moment before she smiled at me and told me that she'd be glad to.

Ever since I first heard the Easter Lady sing I had wanted to hear her sing glad Easter music. For the Easter Lady seemed so much a part of gladness and music and light and spring flowers. So when Easter Day came, and our little chapel was all dressed in blossoms and vines from our fresh-air farm, I sat in the back seat and fastened my eyes on her face and just listened. I've read of people listening prayerfully. Well, that's how I listened.

She was all in white in honor of the day, was the Easter Lady, and her face seemed very pale and more beautiful than ever. And when she opened her lips—lips that were as faintly, gloriously pink as Rosa's coral necklace—and began to sing, I knew that I no longer cared how far above me she was; that I hardly cared whether she was an adventuress or a millionairess or—or anything. I just knew that I loved her—and that I must tell her so.

"Christ the Lord is risen today," she sang: and I knew that he was risen. All over the little chapel I saw other people who felt the same conviction in a strong, new way. Old Jim Robins, who had never believed in anything, began to sob, and even the children were quiet and looked like cherubs. And I shut my eyes while her golden voice told me that heaven was very near after all—very near indeed.

And when she finished, I stole quietly out of the room and stood on the steps in God's sunlight and thanked him for the wonderful joy that he had sent me on Easter Day.

EAST SIDE breezes are tricky, elfish things. They dance around stuffy corners and down alleyways and up dingy stairs, and if any paper or letter or scrap of fancy-work lies in the way, they pick it up and carry it along until they pause to rest for a moment, and the stolen article drops. As I stood on the steps, a sheet of paper brushed across my face and fell suddenly at my feet. Mechanically I picked it up, disinterestedly I glanced at it, and then I gasped; for I saw the picture that I had been looking for so long—a picture with a name under it.

And I stood there in the warm sunlight a bit dazed, with the tricky little breeze ruffling my hair. I stood there with the paper in my hand and the light of a great understanding growing in my heart. At last I knew why the Easter Lady had been afraid to tell her name, why she had slipped away so mysteriously, why we had never seen her at night. At last I had the secret that she had kept from the whole settlement house.

For the sheet of paper was a program of a very cheap East Side music hall.

THE people began to file out of the chapel, the children still cherubic, old Jim Robins still mopping his eyes. More than one of them stopped and told me, in broken English, what the music had meant to them. And though I must have answered them, I don't know what I said, for I was only conscious of a great longing to see the Easter Lady—and to tell her that I understood. And when the last one had gone away I turned and walked softly back into the little chapel. For I knew that she was still there.

The chapel was quiet and very sweet with the scent of crushed flowers. Our children pat the ferns, and bury their little noses in the center of the blossoms, and—well, after a service they are dilapidated. The flowers, I mean.

And there, in the midst of all the quietness and sweetness, with her golden head bowed on the keyboard of the piano, was the Easter Lady. She lifted her face at my step, and I saw that her eyes were bright with tears.

I have never been tactful. Being tactful is a talent, I think.

"Easter Lady," I questioned abruptly, "is that where you sing at night?"

The Journal of the Michigan State Medical Society comments thus in a recent issue:

"Symptoms of arsenical poisoning are very similar to those of cholera infantum; undoubtedly a number of cases of cholera infantum were really cases of arsenical poisoning, but death, if occurring, was attributed to cholera infantum.

"We repeat, arsenical fly destroying devices are dangerous and should be abolished. Health officials should become aroused to prevent further loss of life from their source. Our Michigan Legislature, this last session, passed a law regulating the sale of poisonous fly papers."

SHE went back with a wonderful self-control. Forsythe's face lighted and his reluctant hand grew suddenly eager as he worked. Rosa came presently, and others, and the laughing chatter went on quite as Margaret had known it would. And she—so great is the power of the human will under pressure—went calmly about, directing here and there, planned and executed; put little, dainty, wholly unnecessary touches to the stage; and never let any one know that her heart was being crushed with the weight of a great and awful fear. Yet she was steadily upborne by the rising of a great, deep trust. As she worked and smiled and ordered, she was praying: "O God, don't let it be true! Keep him! Save him! Bring him! Make him true! I know he is true! O God, bring him safely soon."

MEANTIME there was nothing she could do for him. She could not send the young officer after him. She could not speak of the matter to one of those present, and Bud—where was Bud? It was the first time since she came to Arizona that Bud had failed her. She might not leave the schoolhouse, with the officer and Rosa there, to go and find him, and she might not do anything else. There was nothing to do but work on feverishly and pray as she had never prayed before.

By and by one of the smaller boys came and she sent him back to Tanner's to find Bud, but he returned with the message that Bud had not been home since morning; and so the last hours before the evening, which would otherwise have been so brief for all there was to be done, dragged their weary length away and Margaret worked on.

She did not even go back for supper at the last, but sent one of the girls to her room for a few things she needed and declined even the nice little chicken sandwich that thoughtful Mrs. Tanner sent back along with the things. At last the audience began to gather.

By this time her anxiety was so great for Gardley that all thought of how she was to supply the place of the absent Jed had gone from her mind. Gardley! Gardley! if only Gardley would come! That was her one thought. What should she do if he did not come at all? How should she explain things to herself afterward? What if it had been true? What if he were the kind of man Lieutenant Forsythe had intimated? How terrible life would look to her! But it was not true. No, it was not true! She trusted him! With her soul she trusted him! He would come back sometime and he would explain all. She could not remember his last look at her on Sunday and not trust him. He was true! He would come!

SOMEHOW she managed to get through the terrible interval, to slip into the dressing-room and make herself sweet and comely in the little white gown she had sent for with its delicate blue ribbons and soft lace ruffles. Somehow she managed the expected smiles as one and another of the audience came around to the platform to speak to her. There were dark hollows under her eyes, and her mouth was drawn and weary, but they laid that to the excitement. Two bright red spots glowed on her cheeks, as she smiled and talked with her usual gaiety. People looked at her and said how beautiful she was, and how bright and untiring, and how wonderful it was that the Ashland school had drawn such a prize of a teacher. The seats filled, and the noise and the chatter went on. Still no sign of Gardley nor any one from the camp, and still Bud had not returned. What could it mean?

But the minutes were rushing rapidly now. It was more than time to begin. The girls were in a flutter in one cloak room at the right of the stage, asking her more questions in a minute than one could answer in an hour; the boys wanted all sorts of help; and three or four of the actors were attacked with stage fright as they peered through a hole in the curtain and saw some friend or relative arrive and sit down in the audience. It was all a mad whirl of seemingly useless noise and excitement, and she could not, no, she could not go on and do the necessary things to start that awful play. Why, oh, why had she ever thought of getting up a play?

Forsythe up behind the piano whispered to her that it was time to begin. The house was full. There was not room for another soul. Margaret explained that the Fiddling Boss had not yet arrived, and caught a glimpse of the cunning designs of Forsythe in the shifty turning away of his eyes as he answered that they could not wait all night for him; that if he wanted to get into it he ought to have come early. But even as she turned away she saw the little, bobbing, eager faces of Pop and Mom Wallis away back by the door, and the grim towering figure of the Boss, his fiddle held high, making his way to the front amid the crowd.

She sat down and touched the keys, her eyes watching eagerly for a chance to speak to the Boss and see if he knew anything of Gardley, but Forsythe was close beside her all the time, and there was no opportunity. She struck the opening chords of the overture they were to attempt to play, and somehow got through it. Of course the audience was not a critical one, and there were few real judges of music present; but it may be that the truly wonderful effect she produced upon the listeners was due to the fact that she was playing a prayer with her heart as her fingers touched the keys, and that instead of a preliminary to a fairy revel the music told the story of a great soul struggle, and reached hearts, as it tinkled and rolled and swelled on to the end. It may be, too, that the Fiddling Boss was more in sympathy that night with his accompanist than was the other violinist, and that this was why his old fiddle brought forth such tender tones.

At the end, with her heart sobbing its trouble to the keys, Margaret looked up sadly, and there, straight before her, through a hole in the curtain made by some rash youth to glimpse the audience, or perhaps even put there by the owner of the nose itself, she saw the little, freckled, turned-up member belonging to Bud's face. A second more and a big bright eye appeared and solemnly winked at her twice as if to say: "Don't you worry, it's all right!"

She almost started from the stool, but kept her head enough to finish the chords, and as they died away she heard a hoarse whisper in Bud's familiar voice:

"Whoop her up, Miss Earle, we're all ready. Pull the curtain, there, you guy. Let her rip, everything's O. K."

WITH a leap of light into her eyes Margaret turned the leaves of the music and went on playing, as indeed she should have done. Bud was there anyway, and that somehow cheered her heart. Perhaps Gardley had come, or Bud had heard of him; and yet, Bud did not know he had been missing, for Bud had been away himself.

Nevertheless she summoned courage to go on playing. Nick Bottom wasn't in this first scene anyway, and this would have to be gone through with somehow. By this time she was in such a dazed state that she could only think from moment to moment. The end of the evening seemed now to her as far off as the end of a hale old age at the beginning of a lifetime. Somehow she must walk through it, but she could only see a step at a time.

Once she turned half sideways to the audience and gave a hurried glance about, catching sight of Fudge's round near-sighted face, and that gave her courage. Perhaps the others were somewhere present. If only she could get a chance to whisper to some one from the camp and ask when they had seen Gardley last! But there s no chance, of course.

The curtain was jerked back dily and the opening scene of the play gan, the actors going through their parts with marvelous ease and dexterit and the audience silent and charmed tching those strangers in queer co mes that were their own children, ma hing around there at their ease and king weird language that was not u d in any class of society they had eve ome across on sea nor land before.

But Margaret, watching her m ic as best she could, and playing me nically rather than with her mind, ould not tell if they were doing well ill, so loudly did her heart pound o her fears—so stoutly did her heart pr laim her trust.

And thus, without a flaw or n take in the execution of the work sl had struggled so hard to teach the the first scene of the first act drew its close, and Margaret struck th final chords of the music and felt that another minute she must reel a fall from that piano stool. And y she sat and watched the curtain clos with a face as controlled as if nothing t all were the matter.

A second later she suddenly new that to sit in that place calmly a ther second was a physical imposs lity. She must get somewhere to the r at once or her senses would desert h

With a movement so quick t no one could have anticipated it she s ped from her piano stool and under t curtain to the stage and was gone fore the rest of the orchestra had n iced her intention.

SINCE the day that he had ven Margaret his promise to mak od, Gardley had been regular employed by Mr. Rogers looking fter important matters of his ranch. fore that he had lived a free and eas life, working a little now and then w n it seemed desirable, having no set i rest in life, and only endeavoring from y to day to put as far as possible fr his mind the life he had left behin im. Now, however, all things became ferent. He brought to his service th een mind and ready ability that had ade him easily a winner at any ga , a brave rider and a never-failing hot. Within a few days Rogers saw hat material was in him, and as the eks went by grew to depend more and ore upon his advice.

There had been much trouble ith cattle thieves, and so far no metl l of stopping the loss or catching the t ves had been successful. Rogers final put the matter into Gardley's hands to rry out his own ideas, with the men the camp at his command to help him the camp itself being only a part of Rc rs's outlying possessions, one of s eral such centers from which he work his growing interests.

Gardley had formulated a sche by which he hoped eventually to ge old of the thieves and put a stop t the trouble. He was reasonably su he was on the right track, but his lan required slow and cautious work. He had for several weeks suspected hat the thieves made their headqu ers in the region of Old Ouida's Cabi nd worked their raids from that dire on. It was for this reason that of la the woods and trails in the vicini of Ouida's had been secretly patrolle nd watched day and night, and ery passer-by taken note of, until Ga ley knew just who were the frequent of that way and mostly what was eir business. This work was done ernately by the men of the Wallis mp and two other camps, Gardley bein he head of all and carrying all res sibility; and not the least of that ng man's offenses in the eyes of Rosa R ers was that he was so constantly a er father's house and yet never lift an eye in admiration toward her p ty face. She longed to humiliate him nd through him to humiliate Marg et, who presumed to interfere with her flirtations.

WHEN the party from the Fort rode homeward that Sunday after the service at the schoolhouse, Forsythe lingered behind to talk to Margaret, and then rode around by the Rogers place, where Rosa and he had long ago established a trysting place.

Rosa was watching for his passing, and he stopped a half hour or so to talk to her. During this time she casually discussed to Forsythe some of the plans she had overheard Gardley laying before her father. Rosa had very little idea of the importance of Gardley's work to her father, or perhaps she would not have so readily prattled of his affairs. Her main idea was to pay back Gardley for his part in her humiliation with Forsythe. She suggested that it would be a great thing if Gardley could be prevented from being at the play Tuesday evening, and told what she had overheard him saying to her father merely to show Forsythe how easy it would be to have Gardley detained on Tuesday. Forsythe questioned Rosa keenly. Did she know whom they suspected? Did she know what they were planning to do to catch them, and when?

Rosa innocently enough disclosed all she knew, little thinking how dishonorable to her father it was, and perhaps caring as little, for Rosa had ever been a spoiled child, accustomed to subordinating everything within reach to her own uses. As for Forsythe, he was nothing loth to get rid of Gardley, and he saw more possibilities in Rosa's suggestion than she had seen herself. When he at last bade Rosa good night and rode unobtrusively back to the trail he was already formulating a plan.

It was therefore quite in keeping with his wishes that he should meet a dark-browed rider a few miles farther up the trail whose identity he had happened to learn a few days before.

Now Forsythe would perhaps not have dared to enter into any compact against Gardley with men of such ill repute, had it been a matter of money and bribery, but armed as he was with information valuable to the criminals, he could so word his suggestion about Gardley's detention as to make the hunted men think it to their advantage to catch Gardley sometime the next day when he passed their way and imprison him for a while. This would appear to be but a friendly bit of advice from a disinterested party deserving a good turn some time in the future, and not get Forsythe into any trouble. As such, it was received by the wretch, who exulted at the information with ill-concealed delight, and rode away into the twilight like a serpent threading his secret way among the darkest places, scarcely rippling the air, so stealthily did he pass.

AS for Forsythe, he rode away blithely to the Fort with no thought for the forces he had set going. His life had been so far one round of trying to please himself—at others' expense, if need be, but to please himself anyway, with whatever amusement the hour afforded.

At home in the East, where his early life had been spent, a splendid girl awaited his dilatory letters, and set herself patiently to endure the months of separation until he should have attained a certain promotion and be ready for her to come to him. In the South where he had been stationed for six months before being sent West, another lovely girl cherished mementoes of his tarrying and wrote him loving letters in reply to his occasional erratic epistles. Out on the Californian shore a girl with whom he had traveled West in her uncle's luxurious private car with a gay party of friends and relatives, cherished fond hopes of a visit he had promised to make her during the winter. Innumerable maidens of this world, wise in the wisdom that crushes hearts, remembered him with a sigh now and then but held no illusions concerning his kind.

Pretty little Rosa Rogers cried her eyes out every time he cast a languishing look at her teacher; and several of the ladies of the Fort sighed that the glance of his eye and the gentle pressure of his hand could only be a passing joy. But the gay Lothario passed on his way as yet without a scratch on the hard enamel of his heart, till one wondered if it were a heart indeed, or perhaps only a metal imitation.

WHEN Gardley left the camp that Monday morning following the walk home with Margaret from the Sabbath service, he fully intended to be back at the schoolhouse by the time the afternoon rehearsal began. His plans were so laid that he thought relays from other camps were to guard the suspected ground for the next three days, and he could be free. It had been part of the information Forsythe had given the stranger that Gardley would probably pass a certain lonely crossing of the trail at about three o'clock in the afternoon; and had those plans been carried out, the men who lay in wait for him would doubtless have been pleased at having their plans mature so easily; but they would not have been pleased long, for Gardley's men were so near at hand at that time, watching that very spot with eyes and ears and long distance glasses that their chief would soon have been rescued and the captors themselves captured.

But the men from the farther camp, called "Lone Fox" men, did not arrive on time, perhaps through some misunderstanding, and Gardley and Kemp and their men had to do double time. At last, late in the afternoon, Gardley volunteered to go to Lone Fox and bring back the men.

As he rode, his thoughts were of Margaret, and he was seeing again the look of gladness in her eyes when she found he had not gone yesterday; feeling again the thrill of her hands in his, the trust of her smile! It was incredible, wonderful, that God had sent a veritable angel into the wilderness to bring him to himself; and now he was wondering, could it be that he might make good and dare at last to ask her to marry him?

The sky and the air were rare, but his thoughts were rarer still, and his soul was lifted up with joy. He was earning good wages now. In two more weeks he would have enough to pay back the paltry sum for the lack of which he had fled from his old home and come to the wilderness. He would go back, of course, and straighten out the old score. Then what? Should he stay in the East and go back to the old business wherewith he had hoped to make his name honored and gain wealth, or should he return to this wild free land again and start anew?

His mother? Yes, he would go to see his mother. He had disappointed and mortified her, and her life was full with guiding the steps of his two young sisters in society. His father had been dead many years. As for his uncle, his mother's brother, whose heir he was to have been before he got himself into disgrace, he decided not to go near him. He would visit his mother during the day, when his uncle would be away from the house, see his sisters, and then come back, come back and let Margaret decide what she wanted him to be—that is, if she would consent to link her life with one who had been once a failure. Margaret! How wonderful she was!

And so he mused as he rode.

DR. LEVI B. SALMANS, founder and superintendent of the Good Samaritan Hospital at Guanajuato, Mexico, and one of the best-known medical missionaries in that country, writes that up to the present time over 93,000 patients have been treated by the medical workers of the M. E. Church in the state of Guanajuato. An effort is now being made to complete the institutional buildings this year. Apropos of conditions in Mexico, Dr. Salmans writes: "The $100 gold which came to us through the Christian Herald last year was sold for the highest rate of exchange received at any time during the year. We received for it $1,700 Mexican money."

THE conversion of fifty men of the Coast Guard Corps is reported by R. Ashley Cake, who has been conducting meetings at the various stations. Every member of the South Brigantine, N. J., life-saving crew was converted. Mr. Cake is planning to work this summer among the stations in Massachusetts and Rhode Island.

The hill climb test shown above was made by Mr. J. H. Chandler, President of the White Star Oil Co. of Kansas City. Before his connection with this company, Mr. Chandler was in the automobile business, so that he knows every angle of automobile lubrication. The hill climb test in which he found that Veedol carried him over the top of the hill at 20 miles an hour on high gear, is an indication of what Veedol will do for your car.

Gentlemen:

I wanted to put Veedol to some severe practical test. I was in the automobile business for eight years and know about how a motor acts under proper lubrication.

Having this car which is an old Buick 1909 model and it being worn loose in the engine, I thought of trying it up the steepest hill in Kansas City which it had never climbed in high gear.

I filled it up with Veedol and was certainly surprised to see the old car top the hill at 20 miles per hour.

The compression in the motor cylinders was much improved and it did not knock and labor as it had always done before. It was this test which convinced me that Veedol was the best lubricant on the market for I had tried every other oil I had come in contact with and had never produced results like this.

Yours very truly,
J H Chandler

Greater power from new lubricant

Heat in your engine turns a large part of ordinary oil into black solid matter—a cause of great friction and the chief destroyer of power.

This new lubricant resists heat and prevents rapid sedimentation. Mr. Chandler tells how it works.

It is not necessary for you to be satisfied with the tests which other people make. Test Veedol in your own car.

Relative Oil Destruction

The contents of the two bottles shown illustrate clearly the relative durability of ordinary oil and of Veedol, the new lubricant that resists heat. Veedol deposits only a small fraction as much sediment as ordinary oil Structurally, there is a fundamental difference between ordinary oils and Veedol.

Ordinary oils are unstable, and therefore unserviceable, because of non-heat-resisting chemical structure.

Special processes of manufacture developed by this company and the use of Pennsylvania paraffine-base crude oil give Veedol, the new lubricant, its unusual chemical structure, and its remarkable heat-resisting ability.

Why Ordinary Oil Kills Power

Ordinary oil breaks down after a few hours' use and forms black solid matter. Part of the oil loses all lubricating value.

This solid matter means friction. The sediment which has an inactive or negative effect partially crowds out the remaining liquid oil. This under-supply of oil to metal surfaces is the chief cause of friction—heat—wear—repairs—loss of power.

How to Make the Road Test

Remove the drain plug from the lowest part of your motor crank case and allow all old oil to run out. Replace the plug, fill the sump up to correct oil level with kerosene, and run the motor under its own power for about thirty seconds to cleanse the interior. Then draw out all kerosene. Replace the drain plug and refill with Veedol.

The exact amount of fuel and oil in the car should be recorded, and a reading of the speedometer taken before starting. Then let a test be run over a familiar road, including steep hills and straight level stretches, for any distance up to five hundred miles or more.

You will find that your motor has acquired new pick-up and hill-climbing ability due to the maximum mechanical efficiency made possible through Veedol

You will find your mileage on both gasoline and oil increases You will reduce you carbon trouble. Your motor will have more power.

Where You Can Buy Veedol

Progressive dealers everywhere have secured Veedol and can supply you. Look for the orange and black Veedol sign.

Each dealer is supplied with a large chart specifying the right body of Veedol for each automobile, motor-boat or motor-cycle.

If, for any reason, you cannot get Veedol at once, write to the Platt & Washburn Refining Co. By return mail you will receive a copy of the book free, and the name of the dealer who will supply you.

You know this trade-mark through National Periodical Advertising

NAMES, trade-marks, or brands are placed upon goods in order to identify them, thereby fixing the responsibility for their quality and enabling the buyer to ask for what he wants and to get what he asks for.

It naturally follows that goods which are trade-marked and nationally advertised must be better and cheaper than unknown goods, or goods of uncertain origin.

They must be better, because no manufacturer could afford to advertise a branded article unless it had merit. After the first sales, the trade-mark would merely provide a sure means of avoiding the unsatisfactory article.

They must be cheaper, quality considered, because national advertising reduces manufacturing and selling costs by adding so largely to the volume of sales.

Trade-marks and national advertising are the two most valuable servants in business today. Their whole tendency is to raise qualities and standardize them, while reducing prices and stabilizing them.

FOR over fifty years past, American missionaries and the native rulers in countries where missionaries are at work have complained of the havoc wrought by alcoholic liquors. Native chieftains have gone to Europe to plead with the governments to stop sending intoxicating liquors into their countries. Deputations have been sent on a similar mission from Africa, India, Ceylon, Japan, Korea, China, the New Hebrides Islands, and New Zealand. The United States has not been guiltless in this matter. Millions of gallons of New England rum are being exported from Boston to Africa every year, and other parts of the United States are sending out large consignments of intoxicants in the form of beer, wine, whisky, and rum. France sends brandies and absinthe; Spain and Portugal send wines; Holland sends gin, Germany sends beer, whisky and rum. It is estimated that at least 50,000,000 gallons of alcoholic drink of all sorts are being sent yearly by so-called Christian nations into what are designated "heathen lands" where missionaries are laboring. The havoc wrought by "white man's liquor" has become a term of reproach in those lands where the Gospel is being preached.

Twenty-nine years ago, in May, 1887, representatives of all the nations in Europe that have missionaries at work met in London and formed "the United Committee for the Prevention of the Demoralization of the Native Races by the Liquor Traffic." They have accomplished much along legislative lines. In some countries, absolute prohibition has been secured, while in others restrictive measures have been passed. The United States, which sends out more missionaries than any other country, has not had any organization affiliated with the European Committee. When the Ecumenical Conference on Foreign Missions was held in New York City, the European organization sent two delegates in the persons of Rev. John G. Paton, . D., the famous missionary to th New Hebrides, and Dr. C. F. Harf d, of London, for the purpose of hav g an organization formed here that hould affiliate and cooperate with the European Committee. Two bills wer ntroduced in Congress, one by Congr sman Gillett and the other by Senator odge. Nothing came of the effort to ecure legislation at that time. No or nization was formed here. The exp ation of alcoholic liquors to missio lands continued. Boston alone sent ıt to Africa last year over 2,000,000 llons of rum, and other sections of th country added their quotas to a traffi which destroys the missionary work a the bodies and souls of men.

Two meetings have been held r ently in William E. Dodge Hall, 373 urth Avenue, New York—one on F uary 23 and the other on March 8—a which representatives of the largest eva elical denominations were present. provisional organization was forme with the view of effecting a permanent rganization later to revive and carry n the work first undertaken in 1887 s described above. A letter was t to the leading missionary organi tions of the Christian churches of erica and to the various temperance or nizations in the United States and nada, asking them to appoint two d gates and to send their names to th Rev. Hervey Wood, of New York C . A number of responses have alrea been received. Six of the largest der ninations and two temperance organi tions have signified their purpose of iting with the movement. The organ tion, when completed, will be non-se arian and non-partisan. It is inten d to work along legislative and educ ional lines and to promote national an nternational legislation. sitting, with the rod of God in his hand—the rod of the burning bush, of the Red Sea, of the smitten rock. Hour after hour he remained there with that rod uplifted, and its position regulated the success of the troops that fought below. Is it not thus that the great High Priest is interceding for us above? His church is very unequally matched against the mighty hosts that are arrayed against her; and her spiritual weapons may break in vain upon their stubborn resistance. Our only hope is in the prevalence of the mighty prayers which our Lord perpetually maintains. He prays not only for the church collectively, but for its members individually. He says again and again as he said to Simon, "Satan hath desired to obtain thee that he may sift thee as wheat; but I have prayed for thee." He follows his servants into the temptation-zone and he surrounds them with the atmosphere of his spiritual presence.

Live in the Spirit, and you will not fulfil the desires of the flesh. F. B. M.

The Power of a Christian Song

SATURDAY, April 29. Acts 16:25. "At midnight Paul and Silas prayed, and sang praises unto God." With bleeding backs, in the inner prison, with feet fast in the stocks, in the darkness of midnight, with no human hope of delivery, Paul and Silas were so filled with the light and love of God that they were full of rejoicing that they could suffer for Jesus' sake. It is thought that they sang from David's Psalm, saying:

> The sorrows of death compassed me.
> Then called I upon the name of the Lord.
> God is our refuge and strength,
> A very present help in time of trouble.
> He that keepeth thee will not slumber.

The other prisoners marveled at songs sung under such sorrow. Then the prison trembled; the disciples' feet were released, their bonds loosed, a the jailer, rushing toward them, w surprised that they had not escape and cried out, "What shall I do to be s ed?" Then he washed their stripes a sent word to the authorities. Paul a Silas would not leave when invited t lo so by the officers of the city. The were there for victory, and would not part from the prison until the great n of government bowed before them, leading that they depart in peace.

What a wonderful change tha ong-prayer produced! Are not fait ongs the true remedy for trouble? D they not inspire hope in the desponde and reach the very heart of God? Does t all heaven resound with the music our singing, echoing back its p ding melodies?

Singing the national songs the kingdom of God inspires the hole army to push forward in the ba le of the good fight of faith. Eve soul should be a singing pilgrim on th ighway of holiness, wearing the garr nt of praise for the spirit of heaviness, king prisons palaces and dungeons ight, while Nature's trembling ope the doors of opportunity to preach J s to lost men. The War in Europe

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

THE fighting at Verdun continued all the week (April 2-9), but was on the whole perhaps less fierce tha the week before, both sides appar tly being largely engaged in bri ng up re-enforcements and reples hing their supplies of projectiles and explosives.

O Sunday, the infantry activity was trar erred from the west front to the nor front and here the Germans made two attacks in rapid succession on the Fre h positions between the wood of Ha romont and the Vaux region. The irst, the French succeeded in repul g after severe fighting, but were not fortunate with the second, whereby e Germans succeeded in firmly esta ishing themselves in the much-fou t-over village of Vaux.

T e holding of this pivotal point may ena e the Germans to swing the western ortion of the north front southward to far as Bras and Charny, which ope tion would enable them to considera y shorten their line on this northern ont.

O Monday, April 3, the Germans mad another advance on the western fro of Verdun the entire distance betwe Bethincourt on the east and Ha ourt on the west. The occupation of t s line by the Germans materially add to the strength of their position for ucessful operations against Hill No. 04, which is the most difficult nut to c ck on this western front.

T re was very hard infantry fighting n both the western and northern fro of Verdun Tuesday, and intense arti ry duels all day on all fronts. On the est front the Germans made an atta on the village of Haucourt, whi their lines surrounded on three side On the northern front the French had he upper hand in the day's fighting. Here the Germans launched an atta in force on the French positions sou of the village of Donaumont, but wer not only repulsed but driven back nor west into the Chauffour wood, whe the French artillery, concentrating fire, inflicted,severe losses on them.

O Wednesday the situation suffered no aterial change. Thursday saw a Fre h attack on the German positions on e west front at the mill northeast of umont, which was repulsed. On the rth front the French claim to have driv the Germans out of Caillette wo and to have gained ground to the nor thereof. This claim, however, is disp ed by the Germans.

T fighting on Friday somewhat nc sed in intensity on both the wes rn and northern fronts. On the ext ne southerly end of the western fro in the Avocourt Wood, the Fre h improved their position at the so-c led Avocourt redoubt by capturing connecting earthwork. Further nor , however, the Germans finally succ eded in capturing the village of Haucou around which there had been so muc fighting the past few days, and n d ving the French to the east thereof.

T s capture will probably prove to be importance in its influence on future developments on the western front. Haucourt was extremely well fortified by all means of modern artillery, the place being a redoubt• with machine guns disposed in terrace formation, and the village was so situated as to command the whole Forges brook valley, (between Bethincourt and Haucourt), so that as long as it remained in French hands the Germans could not cross this brook.

On Saturday, the Germans delivered a general battle to the east and west of the Meuse, which from the early accounts seems the fiercest in many days, and which is still proceeding as this record closes.

The latest word by way of London is to the effect that the French have withdrawn from the Bethincourt salient extending from Avocourt on the west to Cumiéres on the east, giving up approximately a mile of territory on a front of two miles, an important gain to their enemy.

The British report a victory in Mesopotamia at Umm-el-Henna over the Turks. There was heavy fighting at this same point on Jan. 21, when the Turks were defeated, after which the British relief force advanced to the main Turkish position at Es Sun, between them and Kut-el-Amara, their objective, and were there defeated rather badly and forced to fall back to El Owasa four miles to the east of Umm-el-Henna, where they have since remained. From Umm-el-Henna to Es Sunn is about 13 miles. From the north bank of the Tigris most of this distance stretches to the north of the plain of Khor-i-Suwekie, flooded all the spring and early summer, and when dry in the autumn covered with a crust of salt from one to two feet deep. From Es Sunn to Kut-el-Amara the distance is seven miles.

The news from Holland indicates that she is picking a bone with both Great Britain and Germany simultaneously. The one with England is the seizure by Great Britain of some $11,000,000 in American securities, which Great Britain has taken from Dutch ships in the course of voyages to the United States. There is some reason to believe that Holland will be joined by all the Scandinavian countries and Spain. As a first step, Holland has already forbidden the export of foodstuffs of any kind. This, however, hits Germany as well as England, and Germany has also been invited to explain the reason for concentrating troops on the Dutch border.

THE case of the channel liner Sussex was rapidly approaching a decision when this number of the Christian Herald went to press. On April 5, it was announced from Washington that the American naval attaches at London, and Paris had completed their examination of the hull of the Sussex and were of the opinion that the Sussex was torpedoed. On April 8 the German Admiralty announced that no German war vessel was in the neighborhood of the Sussex at the time of the disaster.

I was only a few steps away from her. It seemed miles.

"Nothing matters," I told her; and somehow I was all laughter and lightness. "Nothing matters,—but you—Easter Lady!"

And nothing did.

The Flower-Decked Morning Tables are the Ones with Puffed Grains on Them

Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice appeal to the dainty.

You are apt to find them on breakfast tables which are otherwise inviting.

For these bubbles of grain—light, airy and fragile—are the cereal food exquisites.

But a Scientist Made Them

But note that the object in puffing grains is to make them hygienic. A great food expert—Prof. A. P. Anderson—invented this strange process.

They are whole-grain foods with every food cell exploded. Thus digestion is made easy and complete. And every atom of each element is made available as food.

They seem like fairy bonbons. They taste like nut confections. But that results from a hundred million steam explosions inside every kernel. And the object is to make them ideal foods. No other process ever breaks up half so many food cells.

Do you think you serve these dainties as often as you should? They are not for breakfast only. Many people like them best served in bowls of milk.

They are ideal foods for between meals—eaten dry like peanuts. They are perfect bedtime foods, because they so easily digest.

There is no waste to Puffed Grains. They never tax the stomach. Foods so delightful and so scientific should form a large part in the diet.

There are three Puffed Grains, and twenty ways of serving. So they offer vast variety.

Acts 12 : 1-19

Laughter at Rome, Prayer at Jerusalem

By Arthur H. Howland

THE Herods were an interesting family. They had achieved an excellent social position. When a Herod went to Rome he was nicely received—invited to the banquets, theater parties and games. All the really nice people of Rome knew the Herods and were glad to receive them into their homes. Of course there were some exceptions to this course of courteous treatment, as in the case of young Herod Agrippa, who was one time put in prison by the emperor because he had been overheard telling his friend Caius that the death of the emperor would not be an event to be deplored. But when this particular emperor did die Caius got his young friend Agrippa released from prison and arranged to have him made king of a group of provinces in Northern Palestine. Later it appears that Agrippa helped the elevation of Claudius to the imperial throne and as reward for this was made king of Judea also. His kingdom then covered almost the entire territory ruled by his grandfather, Herod I.

The Roman ladies were only mildly interested in the tales that the various Herods of the various generations brought back to Rome of the odd people over whom they reigned. Doubtless many a silvery laugh sounded among the curtains of Roman drawing-rooms as young Herod Agrippa, on subsequent visits to Rome, told of the whims and fancies, the prejudices and queer traditions and strange actions of the people he ruled.

Herod, probably, used to like to compare his skilful dealings with the Jews with that of Pontius Pilate, who ruled Judea a short time before him. Pilate had thrown the Jews into a frenzy of rage and grief by placing the Roman standards, surmounted by eagles and banners, showing portraits of the emperor, about the city; he had also used some of the money from the sacred treasury to construct an aqueduct, and they had accused him of embezzling part of these holy funds. On this occasion Pilate quite lost his temper and had the mob that was annoying him butchered. Later he massacred a crowd of people in Samaria, who were hunting for some golden vessels which an insincere prophet declared would be found hidden in Mount Gerizim. Herod was careful about all these matters and avoided trouble, and he liked to tell his Roman friends how well he was getting along with his people, and of the new fortifications, the splendid baths, the great theater, and splendid amphitheater he had built.

But Herod Agrippa did have some trouble with some of his people. He doubtless told the Roman ladies all about it. There was a sect called Christians whom the Jews did not like. The name of their ringleader was James, and Agrippa had beheaded him. Then a singular thing had happened. The Jews were so pleased with the death of James that to please them further Agrippa arrested another of their leaders, a former fisherman of Galilee, whose name was Simon Peter. He was just about to be executed when in the most unaccountable fashion, although he was confined in an inner prison, and guarded by sixteen Roman soldiers, he got away. Perhaps the ladies taunted Agrippa about this, and he was much ashamed of it.

Although these Herods were nice people socially, in some of their ways they were not so nice; but the really nice people of Rome did not care much about these unimportant items. Agrippa's own father, Aristobulus, had been slain by his father, Agrippa's grandfather, as had also been his uncle Alexander and his mother, Mariamne. In fact, many pages of the family's life were marred by stories of poisoning, bloodshed and horrible intrigue Yet they were nice people and ha nice times at Rome, as well as in th other palaces that they visited in othe provinces of the empire.

THAT is one side of the stor The other side is the life of poor, oppressed, enslaved, exploited ople, frightened, cowed, scourged by rture and by poverty, trying to be thful to the God of their fathers l his ancient laws, bewildered, restle un-comprehending. A strange m had come among them, a Carpente from Nazareth, called Jesus. He had imed to be the Messiah; some of th had thought he would be king, and ould free them from the horrible e of Rome, the yoke which rested so avily upon their bleeding shoulders i order that the Herods and their ncely friends at Rome might have pl ty of gold to spend. In their frenzy dis-appointment and misunderst ding, they had turned against this Ca enter and slain him. Now some of fol-lowers were prolonging the tur il in Jerusalem, so they were glac when Herod had killed James, and w not sorry when he put Simon Pet into prison.

But in a certain house in Jer lem, owned by a woman named Ma , far from the laughter and the gold o ome, a group of people were knee g in prayer. They were not pray g to Jupiter, or Juno, or Apollo, or Ve s, or Diana, or Minerva, or Vesta, bu the God of their fathers, whom th Car-penter of Nazareth had broug near to them. They were very sad, y very happy. Sad because James ha been killed, yet happy because they k w he was now with his Lord in P dise. Sad that Peter was in prison ag ; sad because he would doubtless be e uted on the morrow, and glad that ither prison nor death could separate ither him or them from their Frie the Nazarene, and from the Fat r of whom he had told them. Sad ause the air was so full of troub and danger; glad because their hear were so full of hope and of heaven own joy. We know the names of e of the people in that company: Ma who was the matron of the household nd a relative of Barnabas; her son John Mark, was doubtless there; p ably Barnabas himself, and a little ving-maid named Rose, or Rhoda, wh was the Greek form of that name. It is quite likely that Mary, the mo er of the Carpenter, was there. Ver ikely James, her son, the Carpenter's ther; quite likely Andrew, the brothe f the man in prison whose absenc they mourned.

Now notice! In Rome, an em ror's throne, controlling an invincib and omnipresent army; mountains gold; rivers of wine; endless amus ents; volumes of liquid laughter. In rusa-lem, discontent, misgiving, uncer inty, rage, fear; a man in prison, sl ping, chained, between two soldiers with fourteen other soldiers on gu ; in Mary's house, Rose and Andr and John and Barnabas and Jam and Mary and Mary the Carpenter's oth-er, in prayer.

I once heard a London prea er, I think it was Dr. Holden, speaki at a little noon meeting in Exeter H the London Central Y. M. C. A., bout this very incident. He said tha Peter was in Herod's hands; that w true enough. Nobody could deny hat but Herod was in God's hands. That was the thing he and his frien and councilors and soldiers had overl ked. Rev. Thomas J. Choate, comm ting upon Peter's situation in the ison and the pains Herod had tal to confine him, says: "Ah, but erod made a great blunder. He le on access completely unguarded. H ever thought to put a sentinel abo the prison, to block the way to he en's highest throne."

So, while Mary and the rest ar ray-ing there comes a knock at he loor.

Ro jumps from her knees and runs to the ntrance.

"Vho is there?" she cries.

"t is I, Peter. Open the door."

se is so excited and bewildered that in urmoil of joy she runs back to the roo in which her friends are kneeling.

"eter is out of prison!" she cries. "H is standing at the door!"

ey rush forward, throw open the doo and take him into their arms.

d the Roman ladies, on Herod's nex visit to the capitol, twitting him abo this miscarriage of his plans wh he happened to tell them the story, cou not understand a certain strange and rightened perplexity that appeared upo his face.

T RN to verse two again. "He illed James, the brother of John, wit the sword." We think the days of ma trdom are past, but they are not. Do ou realize that the Armenians ma cred in Turkey during the last few onths would have been saved if the had renounced Christ and confess Mohammed? The number of tho who did so is so small as to be alm t negligible. By the thousand the died rather than deny the name of Jes. What would we have done if we ad been there? Many present day unday school pupils are old enough to member the Boxer massacres in Chi in 1900. Thousands of native Ch tians perished then rather than den their Lord. Are we standing up or m? Are we ashamed of him? Are we lling to show our courage, to stand by r consciences? Although the detail re somewhat different today, the lig nent is the same. The laughing ad at Rome; the praying women at Jer alem. As God looks down from his aven, on which side does he find is nding?

A some member of the class to stu up beforehand all he can find abo this house of John Mark's mother n usalem. You know John Mark ate became a close associate of Peter, and s supposed to have written his Gos l under Peter's guidance. Some hi that it may have been in this am house that Jesus ate the last up r with his disciples.

ve another member of the class ool p more of the details of the Herods. Her the First, called Herod the Gre, ruling from 37 to 4 B.C., was he n of Herod Antipater. He had ive ons: Archelaus, reigning from 4 B.C o 6 A.D.; Herod Antipas, reigning ro 4 B.C. to 37 A.D.; this is the Herod of t Gospels, the one who imprisoned and ew John the Baptist and to whom Pila sent Jesus for an informal hearing Lu 23 : 7-15).—These reigns overlap, bee se by Roman appointment some f e Herods ruled over different pro nces at the same time.—Herod Phi, 4 B.C. to 34 A.D.; Alexander and ristobulus. The two last named wer executed at their father's comma. The Herod of today's lesson is Her Agrippa I, son of Aristobulus. His n, Herod Agrippa II, is the monrc before whom Paul appeared (Acts 5 : 3 to 26 : 32).

N ice again the conflicting movemen of the times we are studying. n lestine a blind, frantic, bewildered tru le of the people toward freedom; his ruggle met by the heartless laugher Rome, the thongs of the Roman la drivers, and the steel of the swords and ances of Rome's armies. Jesus, am and Peter, although they did ot ek earthly crowns, were seeking ad l real freedom for their people. h triumphs of democracy are the riu phs of the Gospel of Jesus. He au t brotherhood, helpfulness, cope tion. Now, as then, the struggle ag On the one side, gold and iu ter, luxury, heedlessness and opre on; on the other side, tears and lo poverty and hunger and longing. Ve ust not be discouraged if the tide ee again and again to turn backar God is the friend of the poor, f t oppressed, of the toiler. He will et liver.

B T there is a still deeper struggle epicted in these ancient annals, st ggle, not of the body and its needs, ut the soul. There were temples at or, many of them. There was a rie hood, there were orders of holy virgins, there were oracles and rituals and prayers, but the people did not find God. The priests knew him not. Over in Jerusalem a little girl named Rose knew him. Andrew knew him, and James and Mark, and Mary, and her friend Mary the mother of the Carpenter. These people touched God's hand when they prayed. And the hand they touched could open the prison that Herod had closed. Centuries have passed. The numbers of these believers in the God of whom Jesus had told has grown greater and greater. Their prayers have not only opened prison doors, but have opened new lands for refreshing waters of the Gospel to flow. These gospel waves broke at our feet at last. We know the thrill of finding God, of feeling his touch upon our souls, of recognizing his helpfulness in our lives. Today there is not a land in all the world in which the Gospel of his Son is not proclaimed.

Have some one read, or better still, have the whole school sing, Charles Wesley's wonderful hymn,

And can it be that I should gain
  An interest in my Saviour's blood!

Find the old tune "Fillmore," and sing it the old-fashioned way as it is found in the old Methodist hymnal, not the new. The editors of the new hymnal have spoiled the climax of the composition, which brings out the note of triumph in each stanza. The third stanza likens the awakening of the sin-darkened, sin-bound soul to Peter's deliverance from his dungeon.

Long my imprisoned spirit lay
  Fast bound in sin and nature's night;
Thine eye diffused a quickening ray;
  I woke, my dungeon filled with light,
My chains fell off, my heart was free,
  I rose, went forth and followed thee.

DR. ASA STEWART IGLEHART died of typhoid fever in the hospital at Iquiqui, Chile, on March 18. He leaves his father, Rev. Dr. Ferdinand C. Iglehart, his mother, four brothers and one sister. Dr. Iglehart graduated from the School of Arts at Columbia University, and took his medical degree at the New York University Medical School. A few years ago he went to Chile to practice his profession, where he was useful, happy and prosperous, and where he surrounded himself with multitudes of friends. He was unmarried. Appropriate religious services were held in Iquiqui and the body will be brought to New York City for interment. A leading surgeon of the United States said in a letter since his death: "Dr. Asa S. Iglehart was attractive personally, winning, and very companionable. He was thoroughly conscientious in all his work, lifting himself, but without retarding any one else. Life was an opportunity to work, not for selfish aggrandizement, but to do good in his chosen profession." He had patients among all classes, but he was the idol of the people of the mining camps. He used to say to a father, "You are tired and will have to work tomorrow. You go to bed and I will stay and watch your sick child"; and to the mother unable to hire a nurse, "You have watched all day and will need strength to watch tomorrow. Go to bed. I won't let baby die, so go to sleep sweetly." And now this godly physician has dropped asleep, and the mining camps join with the parents in their mourning, a mourning that is tempered by abiding faith in the Saviour who has redeemed their son.

Character

A MAN'S capacities are determined by several factors, chief among which is the fiber of the stuff he is made of. Like all of Nature's most potent forces this is invisible, and being so, it secures its expression in effects and results. Competency, energy and honesty—these qualities constitute greater worth. And their development creates character.

Motor cars, too, have character. It is injected and molded by the hand of man; its presence is conspicuous when put to the test.

Maxwell Motor Cars, for example, gain character and individuality by reason of experience, care and skill with which they are made. Every operation must strengthen the final result and thus the ability to give abundant and satisfying service is correspondingly increased.

As we specialize in the manufacture of light weight, standardized automobiles, we can and do concentrate our entire attention on those details that make for better motor car character.

The Coming of Easter

By H. Thompson Rich

NOW Easter passes through the postern-gate
And wanders over meadow, dale, and hill;
Each footmark turns to green, the branches fill,
The beetles bask, the birds sing loud and late.
And I, who long have fought against my fate—
A mortal mind swayed by immortal will,
Who long have groaned beneath my bonds until Strength failed me—I am now content to wait.

HUMBLE me in my station, garb me plain,
Yoke me in thraldom to some petty star,
Shackle me with a little close-linked rope
Of years: yet leave the postern-gate ajar.
And oh, when Easter fares the world again
My soul will lift to heaven, re-fired with hope!

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request far prayer or an acknawledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member af the Prayer League. All correspondents are specially requested to make their letters as brief as possible. Write requests and acknowledgments on separate sheets.

THIS letter comes from a prisoner at Pittsburg, Pa.:

For nearly a year, through the kindness of the chaplain here and some unknown friend who paid for the subscription, I have been receiving the Christian Herald. I can't tell you how much encouragement I have received through reading it each week. What has interested me most has been the noon hour Prayer League, and I have been praying for those, too, who have asked help from God. I have given my heart to Jesus. Truly in my case I have reaped what I have sown and more. I am coming to you asking that you have the dear Christian people pray that I may find my wife and child, and that they may come back. My wife, through un-Christian influence, secured a divorce. Please pray that we may become reconciled to each other, for I love her and need her love now more than ever. Also please pray that she may be brought to Jesus too, for the sake of our little eight-year-old child and that I may be restored to them soon, and make a home in which Christ shall reign It has been the prayers of a loving Christian mother, who died while I was in prison, that brought me to Jesus. She taught me to pray and her prayers were answered, and I know that yours for my wants and needs will be answered also. My prayers have been answered here, for God has sent me a friend who has secured me a good position upon release and a new start So I ask you all to pray that the way may open up that I may be able to start fresh and clean, and that my wife and baby may come back to me. Tell the folks that have asked prayers this week that I shall pray for them, especially for those who ask prayers for the reconciliation of husbands and wives and reunion of families.

A New York State friend declares that the Prayer League has made her realize the need of salvation. The members of the League will, we know, unite in earnest prayer for her conversion. She is, indeed, "not far from the kingdom of God." She writes:

For some time I have been reading the Herald, particularly the Prayer League column I am not a Christian, but lately I have been wondering and thinking about it. My father was an infidel, and I was brought up to think that Christians were either hypocrites or else themselves deceived. I was taught that one only needed to be straight and true and that there was no sin but a lie. Somehow this does not seem enough, and although I hardly know what I wish or expect, I have made up my mind to ask you to pray for me that I may feel a real desire to be a Christian, and that somehow I may understand about God and Jesus Christ, and that they may mean something real and vital to me—in other words, that I may feel my need of God and be converted.

A Mother from Bolivar, Tenn., writes: "I wish to acknowledge direct answer to prayer for financial aid. Who can doubt God's faithfulness to answer prayer? Again I ask the prayers of the League that my beloved daughter's mind may be restored. She has been insane six long years, caused by overstudy. Please pray for her. May our heavenly Father bless this good work."

Mrs. L. S., Highland, Mich., writes: "I wrote you last autumn asking prayer for my recovery to health from a long series of illnesses. I certainly received great benefit in a very clear apparent way. Later I wrote you asking prayer for a brother who was taken dangerously ill, and in that case also he was wonderfully helped. I am a great believer in prayer." This friend now asks prayer that her eyes may be healed. She adds: "My eyes, that had been so bad for a year and a half, did not get better. They pain me so, and not being able to use them, it makes my life so terribly lonely."

A Kitchen of Mercy

ONE of the outcomes of the war in Berlin is the American Relief Kitchen. In cooperation with the American Colony and the American Association of Commerce and Trade Maintenance, this relief kitchen was established with the object of giving a wholesome meal daily to as many distressed persons as possible. About a hundred ladies of the American Colony in Berlin volunteered to serve the meals. The relief kitchen is housed in a villa, placed at the disposal of the committee by Herr Robert Huthmann, a leading citizen, and many Americans in Germany have assisted with contributions. It has been feeding on an average 200 of the deserving poor daily. Pastor J. F. Dickie, of the American Church in Berlin, writes to the Christian Herald: "For a long time our American Kitchen has been feeding the needy. As there is hardly an American left here now to help, we wonder if you cannot aid us in this philanthropic work. Whatever you send will be administered under the personal supervision of myself, Mr. Wolf, the president of the American Board of Trade, and Professor Geo S. Atwood, the secretary and treasurer of that board. Your Christian Herald readers have always believed in feeding the hungry the whole world over. We would be very thankful for anything you might be able to send us for this work." Any contributions in aid of the American Kitchen in Berlin that are sent to the Christian Herald by interested readers will be forwarded as Mr. Dickie advises. It might be mentioned that among the official patrons of the kitchen are the American ambassador, Mr. Gerard, and Mrs. Gerard, and the American consul-general, Julius G. Lay, and Mrs. Lay.

Among the Workers

A DAMAGE suit for $20,000 against the Rev. Elmer Lynn Williams of Grace M. E. Church, Chicago, filed by a hotel keeper whom the pastor had accused of running an immoral resort, collapsed after three and a half days of perjured testimony. The court, after hearing the plaintiff's case, directed the jury to find for the defendant. This suit was the culmination of six years of desperate effort on the part of Chicago's underworld to frighten Mr. Williams and to stop a war on vice which he has conducted relentlessly and successfully.

THE REV. HUNTER CORBETT, D. D., the veteran missionary at Chefoo, China, writes "When I arrived here in 1863, there were less than ten converts in this province of 30,000,000. Now there are 40,000 connected with the various missions. By God's blessing another fifty years will surely see millions brought to a saving knowledge of the truth." A year ago the Chinese Year-Book gave 253,210 Chinese church members Of this number 65,786 were connected with the Presbyterian Missions.

THE town of Newman, Ill., is filled with religious fervor as the result of three weeks' work by Evangelist Edward T. Thomas of Muncie, Ind. A Gospel team formed among the men who had been converted, now has 109 recruits and is holding prayer meetings and evening services in the neighboring churches.

THE Williamsburg Mission to the Jews during the past year has baptized twelve persons and reports many conversions.

"Who Was the Speaker?"

UNDER the above caption, the Christian Herald in its issue of March 1 quoted a paragraph from an address delivered in New York City twenty years ago by an orator of national fame. This was the quotation which we then printed, supplementing it with an invitation to our readers to write to us within the month of March, giving the name of this orator "who gave so lucid and statesmanlike a definition of national honor and national opportunity twenty years ago, which is equally applicable to the situation today."

If our boasted civilization and Christianity mean anything, they should mean this: no war is justifiable unless the cause or object stand in just proportion to its cost in blood, in destruction, in human misery, in political corruption, in social demoralization, in relapse of civilization: and even then it is justifiable only when every expedient of statesmanship to avert it has been thoroughly exhausted.

What is the rule of honor to be observed by a power so strong and so advantageously situated as this republic is? Of course, it should not tamely submit to real encroachments upon its rights. But surely it should not, whenever its own notions of right or interest collide with the notions of others, fall into hysterics and act as if it really feared for its own security and its very independence. With all its latent resources for war, it should be the great peace power of the world. It should never forget what a proud privilege and what an inestimable blessing it is not to need, and not to have, big armies and navies to support. It should seek to influence mankind, not by heavy artillery, but by good example and wise counsel. It should see its highest glory, not in battles won, but in wars prevented. It should be so invariably just and fair that other nations would instinctively turn to it as their mutual friend and the natural adjuster of their differences, thus making it the greatest preserver of the world's peace. It will be a glorious day for the United States when the good sense and the self-respect of the American people see in this their manifest destiny. It all rests upon peace. Is not this peace with honor? Is not this good Americanism? It is surely today the Americanism of those who love their country most.

We promised to divide $100 among those readers who sent us the correct answer to the question, "Who was this speaker?" Six hundred and one replies have been received from our readers, divided as follows:

Ex-President McKinley, 295; William Jennings Bryan, 107; Carl Schurz, 55, Theodore Roosevelt, 33, John Hay, 15, Benjamin Harrison, 12; Grover Cleveland, 9, General O. O. Howard, 8; Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, 7; Henry Grady, 6; Chauncey M. Depew, 4; Richard Olney, 3; James G. Blaine, 3; two votes apiece for the following: Governor Fisk, General J. A. Logan, W. T. Sherman, J. J. Ingalls, Lew Wallace, Woodrow Wilson, James A. Garfield, Louis Klopsch, J. W. Daniel, and J. P. Altgeld, and one vote apiece for Senator Hoar, Washington Gladden, Lyman Abbott, Abraham Lincoln, General Lee, W. H. Taft, Henry Ward Beecher, Mark Twain and sixteen others all more or less distinguished in American oratory.

The fifty-five who gave the name of Carl Schurz sent the correct answer. The passage was taken from an address by Mr. Schurz, delivered at a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York on January 2, 1896, Mr. Schurz rising to second the resolutions embodied in a report to the Chamber by its Committee on Foreign Commerce and the Revenue Laws upon the then pending Venezuelan question. The address, which is given under the title of "The True Americanism," may be found in Volume 9, page 1018, of "American Eloquence," published by the University Society of New York. It is a magnificent speech, which is singularly applicable to present conditions in the country—a speech which every American who loves his country and does not desire to see it embroiled in the quarrels of Europe can read with genuine appreciation. It holds up the ideal of "Higher Americanism," which regards it as our duty to aim to be the peace power of the world, and to strive, by every means consistent with national honor, to live up to that ideal in our diplomacy, our international relations, our business and in the cultivation of the love of peace. Mr. Schurz had been a military leader in the Civil War, but in that address he put himself on record as opposing the spending of our resources "during long periods of peace on armaments of tremendous cost without immediate use for them." His view of "true Americanism" is identical with that held by a very large majority of the American people today.

The Christian Herald congratulates the fifty-five winners in this agreeable contest, and has sent to the fortunate competitors a check for the proportion of the prize to which each is entitled. Their names are given below:

William F. Sipfle Illinois; Walfred E. Peterson, Minnesota; E. J. Heurlin, Illinois; Katherine Darnell, Kentucky; W. L. Collier, Missouri; W. H. Young, Massachusetts; F. A. Trautmann, Wisconsin; Mrs. R. H. Sherwood, Michigan; L. J. Keyes, Wisconsin; L. C. Niver, Massachusetts; O. A. Ferner, Iowa; J. T. Roschke, Missouri; Joseph H. Berg, California; Edward J. Answers to Bible Contest Inquiries

Question: I will use your specimen picture, December 15, about the "Sower and the Seed" as an illustration of what I wish to know. Now, suppose for the best answer I should give, "And when he sowed, some seeds fell by the wayside, and the fowls came and devoured them up" (Matt. 13: 4). If any more of the five answers are to be given, should they be on the same subject, for example, a continuation of the description in the same book or even in another book, as in Mark 4: 3, 4. 4? Or, should the other answers be entirely different: for example, "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy" (Ps. 126: 5)?

Do you mean to bring out of the picture a different meaning by using the other answers, as in the above, or should they continue the same line of thought as the one considered the best, the first one?—Miss E. V. P., Warm Springs, Va.

Answer: Verses you submit for a picture may continue the line of thought expressed in the first verse submitted, or may develop an entirely new angle of description. There are no restrictions upon this point at all. Contestants may exercise their ingenuity to the full in submitting verses they believe fit the pictures, tempering their choice in each instance by their judgment, and the Judges at the close will say which are the best verses for each picture.

Question: (1) If a certain verse, as it stands alone, is applicable to a certain picture and something in the contest renders it inapplicable, would the use of that verse be credited?

(2) Where the same event is described at different places in the Bible, as in Kings and Chronicles, the different Gospels, etc., do you intend that contestants should give all the verses describing the particular incident to which they think the picture refers, or should the verses submitted relate to a different incident?—Mrs. F. M. R., Wesleyville, Pa.

Answer: (1) We take it, from your first question, that you are wondering whether a verse submitted for a picture should be considered with relation to the story in the Bible of which the verse is a part. Our answer is that you should submit each verse as a separate title or answer for a picture. Each verse will stand alone as one answer. Only a portion of a verse may fit a picture, but the entire verse must be submitted.

(2) Where the same event is described at different places in the Bible, we can only say that you should use your judgment in submitting the verses that best describe or fit the picture you have in mind for the verses. Remember that the Judges may designate two or more verses as "best" for a picture.

One that takes a tight grip on facts, figures, names, details of every kind and hangs onto them through life—that's the kind of memory you can have if you will give me ten minutes of your spare time daily for a few weeks. I will make your mind an infallible classified index—give you power to concentrate, overcome self-consciousness, enable you to think on your feet, and address an audience intelligently without hesitancy and without notes.

The Key to Success
Stop Forgetting

During the past 20 years I have trained thousands of people to STOP FORGETTING—aided them to greater business and social success—I know positively that the person with a strong, tenacious memory, though he be far behind at the beginning of the race for success, advances and soon outdistances his forgetful rival. The demands of commercial and professional life are so exacting in their details of facts and figures to be remembered, that to succeed or even hold your own you simply must possess a good memory.

Merry Moments

FAIRY TALES WILL NOT DOWN.—It is related that Admiral Sigsbee was conducting a little grandson through the Zoo, and stopped before the aviary. The little chap noticed a stork gravely regarding him. "Oh, grandpa," he exclaimed, "I really believe that stork recognizes me."

LANGUAGE BY DEDUCTION.—She was a little girl, and very polite. It was the first time she had been on a visit alone, and she had been carefully instructed how to behave.

"If they ask you to dine with them," papa had said, "you must say, 'No, thank you; I have already dined.'"

It turned out just as papa had anticipated. "Come along, Mildred," said her little friend's father. "You must have a bite with us."

"No, thank you," said the little girl, with dignity; "I have already bitten."

MUST HAVE DESERVED WHAT HE GOT.—A young man calling upon his sweetheart was told she would soon be down stairs. The little sister was sent to entertain him. As she came near him, he noticed her hand tightly closed and asked her what she had in it. She opened it and the young man said, "It's beans." Whereupon the little one exclaimed, "You do know beans, don't you?" Then he took her upon his knee and began trotting her up and down, at which the little miss looked up innocently into his face and said, "I rode a real donkey once."

A TRIFLE INACCURATE.—A teacher in a New England school asked her pupils for compositions on the poet Longfellow.

One pupil, a fifteen-year-old girl, wrote as follows:

"Henry W. Longfellow was born in Portland, Maine, while his parents were traveling in Europe. He had many fast friends, among whom the fastest were Phoebe and Alice Cary."—Exchange.

AND IT WASN'T A FIRE FLY.—Alice rushed in from the garden where she had been picking flowers. She was badly stung by a bee, and was holding on to her finger and sobbing pitifully: "O, mother," she cried, "I burned me on a bug!"—Brooklyn Life.

A SAFE OFFER.—It is said that while a revivalist was holding services in one of the remote regions of the South a country convert, full of zeal, offered himself for service. "I am ready to do anything the Lord asks of me," said he, "so it's honorable."—Watchman Examiner FINANCIALLY IGNORANT.—Dark Wayfarer: "Does I know where de Fo'th Nat'nal Bank is? Why, boss, I don't even know where is de First Nat'nal Bank!"—Exchange.

ILLUSIVE FAME.—"What is he noted for?"

"He is either a literary man or a magazine-writer, I can't remember which."—Life.

Women and the Bible

THE One Hundredth Anniversary of the New York Female Auxiliary Bible Society was observed Thursday, April 13, in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, with addresses by Dr. J. H. Jowett and Rev. Joseph W. Kemp.

Of all the children sent to Mont Lawn, none more deeply appreciate its joys and privileges, none carry home more glowing reports, and none profit more by its lessons, than the children recommended by the New York Female Auxiliary Bible Society.

Organized in 1816 in New York City Hall, for the purpose of distributing Scripture in the homes of the people, the Society soon learned that the most effective way to gain entrance into a family is through its children.

During 1915 over 300 meetings were held for mothers and over 200 for children. Over 1,600 adults were gathered for Bible study and nearly 1,900 children. More than 30,000 visits were made. Employment was found for many out of work, medical aid was given where needed, and in the summer children and women were sent on excursions or vacations.

One little girl on her return from her summer outing remarked: "We never eat breakfast up there without washing ourselves and fixing up, and it feels so much nicer. I'd rather get up earlier and do it." Another child, anxious to extend the helpful influence received while in the country, said to her mother: "Mamma, I never saw you pray; don't you know how? Perhaps they'll let you go up there with me next summer, and they'll teach you how to pray."

For those children who cannot be sent into the country, the Bible readers hold meetings in neighboring parks. A woman who was attracted to one such little group by their singing, remained to the "story-telling." At the close of the devotional exercises, while the children were playing, the woman approached the Bible-reader. "Did you say that story was in the Bible?" she asked. When assured that it was, she replied, "Well, you must have a different Bible from ours. I used to hear my father read the Bible, but there never were nice stories like that. Our Bible was so dry, I never read it."

"JUST DAVI

By
ELEANOR H. PORTE
Author of "POLLYANNA"

Everyone who has r d "Pollyanna" should r d "Just David." He is s lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Po er believes that the idea of the possibility of happi ss should be held up to peo e, but she does not attemp o preach about it. She sim y lets her characters spe k. Much of her success lies n the fact that her charac rs are all simple and natu l. She says her mind has of n played around the idea a child brought up to kn w only what is good.

"Just David" is not o y a story of amazing pop r appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as w l. Everyone who reads it s the same enthusiasm. Questions and Answers

READER, Pennsylvania. I have lately been assailed almost constantly by most distressing doubts, doubts of the reality of the future life and ol he love and even of the existence of God. ast August I lost my wife. It has been terrible mental strain. I almost feel should want to die and go where she is f it were not for my children, for whom am asking God to let me live. My vife was a beautiful Christian character. firmly believe in God and his eternal ruths and am putting my trust in him. 'et these harassing, distressing, terrible oubts come, and I cannot escape them. should be grateful for a word of counsel. so often happens in these sad letters of spi ual darkness and doubt, the answer lies hid n away in the letter itself. You write: "I has been a terrible mental strain." Do yo not realize what a delicate piece of machi ry the mind is? Nothing in all the univer of matter is so wonderful as the human bra, with its power to think, feel and will. No when this brain machinery is shocked by great sorrow such as you have been thr gh, it is not strange that unexpected tho hts and feelings and experiences should res . Just as one cannot think normally and acc ately after losing sleep for some time, so e strain of grief prevents the mind from see ; and feeling clearly and truly. You sho d make an effort to get some rest or cha e from your daily routine, which will rel and rest and tone up your mind and ner s. You will probably find then that you re not so sure of anything else in the world as at you will see your dear wife again and be th her. With this returning conviction wil ome again the conviction that God is goo and kind, and you will be convinced of his resence and blessing. When you are we ested, seek out the most spiritual Christia you can find, attend their meetings, listen to eir songs and testimonies, and let the swe ness and assurance of their religious exper ce help you and lift you up. Observe aga what divine grace is doing every day and ght to redeem and transform human live Read the life stories of the world's sai who have found God and been true to hin Keep your mind fixed on God's promises o forgive and cleanse the heart, and as you rust him for this cleansing, you will find aga the sense of his nearness and kindness. Yo heart will be filled with gratitude for the me ry of such a wife as your letter and its enc ures show her to have been, for the sure pro ect of being joined to her again, and for the ildren who have been left to your guidanc Then go vigorously to work, trying to che and save and comfort others who are in and sorrow and need. You must deterr ne not to lose your faith. Professor Ja s, the great psychologist, wrote a book call "The Will to Believe," showing that the ill can control the mind's belief. You hav too much at stake to let go your faith. Yo children may go down, and others will go wn, if you fail. Determine to be true to d. Think of past blessings, and "cast not way your confidence." The light will soo reak again. Read Isa. 43:1-3.

I der, Orchard Park, N. Y. The stateme you quote is taken from the official report pre red by the Rev. Dr. Carroll, the compiler of t last United States religious census.

I M. V., Calif. The suggestion of a resolution that the daily newspaper is a detriment rat than a benefit to public welfare" is a pre sterous one. While it may be true that cert n ultra-sensational publications have litt egard for truth or morals the daily press, as hole, is one of the greatest aids to public ins ction and enlightenment. The newspaper is igilant sentinel, watchful of the people's int sts and the guardian of their liberties.

I K., Moundridge, Kan. The passage wa ng the man who puts the bottle to his nei or's mouth may be found in Hab 2: 15.

D. R. Wagner, Sumner, Ill., a veteran rea of this journal, writes: "I send you a pho graph of four generations of my family. Wa born in Perry County, Ohio. Came to Illi s in 1855, when there were deer and tur s here, and located on a 160-acre farm. h e lived on the same for fifty-six years. Am the father of seven children, five boys and two girls. I have been a reader of the Christian Herald for twenty-two years. Am seventy-seven years old and do not use glasses." We are always glad to hear from our old friends. Mr. Wagner's photographic group shows that the hardy pioneer qualities of the man who homesteaded in Illinois over sixty years ago have been inherited by his descendants. His is the sound and sane kind of stock of which our great commonwealth is built.

Mrs. E. E. B. Paul Lawrence Dunbar, the poet, was born in Dayton, Ohio, in 1872, married in 1898, and died in Dayton February 9, 1906.

D. U. O., Pine Level, N. C. The passage in Mark 9 29, according to some commentators, was intended by our Lord for the future guidance of his disciples, rather than as a reproof. This is the opinion of Dean Alford, who wrote that as Christ himself was with the twelve they could not fast nor spiritually prepare themselves sufficiently for dealing with such cases. Turning to the same incident in Matt. 17, however, we find an additional reason. It was not only because of the lack of preparation through fasting, but "because of your unbelief." Their faith was not yet sufficiently strong to enable them to deal confidently with all the difficulties they encountered. It should be noted that Matthew also adds the words of Jesus, "Howbeit this kind goeth not out but by prayer and fasting." Every day seems to have been a new revelation to the disciples of the power and majesty of the Master which they felt they could never hope to emulate, so amazing were the results he accomplished.

A. R., Mass. The passage in Rom. 8:11 has been the subject of considerable discussion, and there are various readings from the early versions. One group of Bible authorities holds that the sense of the passage may be thus compounded: "Your bodies indeed are not exempt from the death which sin brought in, but your spirits, even now in this existence, have in them an undying life: and if the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, even these bodies of yours, though they yield to the last enemy and the dust return to dust, shall yet experience the same resurrection as that of their living Head, in virtue of the indwelling of the same Spirit in you that quickened him." That Paul intended that it should apply to conditions in this life is made evident from the verses that follow in the same chapter.

W. E. W., Amarillo, Texas. The general Bible teaching is that one who lends money has no right to take advantage of the borrower, to exact more than a fair rate of interest. In many states the laws are specific in limiting the interest rate. It would be extraordinary indeed if anyone who is a member of the Christian Church and professes to be a follower of Christ should extort from a brother member an usurious rate of interest. We cannot assume to judge of individual cases of which we have no intimate knowledge.

E. F. S., Jeffersonton, Va. The views of this journal have repeatedly been expressed concerning the munitions traffic which is being conducted here and by which many private concerns are getting rich. The nation has a great moral responsibility for this traffic which no sophistry can explain away. No matter to what nation or nations we may sell these weapons of murder, the traffic is un-Christian and inhumane in the last degree.

N. D., Springfield, Ohio. We are to confess our sins to God, and are also encouraged to confess them to one another. See James 5:16. This does not, however, mean that we should pour the story of our misdeeds into the ear of a priest, but rather to seek counsel with Christian brethren of mature experience who will be able to strengthen us and lead us to better lives hereafter. If we have wronged anyone, it is our duty as Christians to confess the wrong and ask forgiveness. If we have done a wrong which affects no one but God and ourselves, we are not under compulsion to confess it except to God, who is Judge over all. Still, even in such a case, confession to another may be very helpful and may ease the load on our own hearts. It should not be forgotten, however, that there are some confessions that are capable of doing evil rather than good, and these we should take to our Maker in prayer and alone.

R. M. Anderson, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: "In a recent issue you say 'there are various traditions of the work of early missionaries in England, but the first one whose work is clearly established historically is Augustine, who was sent out by Pope Gregory in 596.' As one more than ordinarily interested in this subject, I cannot agree with you. Dr. Burton says, 'Eusebius certainly believed the Britons were converted as early as the apostolic age.' The Rev. Beale Post, in his Britannic Researches, contends 'that Aristobulus—one of the Seventy—brought Christianity into Britain.' The Venerable John Williams, late Archbishop of Cardigan, confirms the latter, and says 'that Claudia, mentioned in II Tim. 4:21, was a British princess.' Baronius, guided by a manuscript in the Vatican, says 'that Joseph of Arimathea brought the Gospel to Britain, A. D. 35.' Blackstone's Commentaries, Book I, chapter 8, says, 'The ancient British church, by whomsoever planted, was a stranger to the Bishop of Rome, and all his pretended authority.' Tertullian, in the year A. D. 190, says, 'There are places in Britain, inaccessible to Roman arms, which were subdued to Christ,' and we know the Roman soldier Albyn (or Alban) suffered martyrdom about the year 311. It is a fact of history not to be disputed that the British bishops were present at the Council of Arles, 314; at Nice in 325; and at Sardica in 347. In 596, when Augustine visited England, he found the old British Church regularly organized and established. The learned Theophilus Gale confirms Strabo's opinion that the Phœnicians visited Cornwall for tin, and that the word 'Britannia' is derived from two Syriac words, signifying 'the land of tin.' The British Church could not only support itself prior to the year 350, but it sent Ninian to the Picts of southern and central Scotland, as well as Patrick, a Briton, to southern Scotland, Wales and Ireland, as missionaries. I claim the Church of England was established five centuries before Rome sent representatives there."

F. L. D., Sigma, Va. The passage in I Cor. 7:36 has been better translated: "Thus if any man think that he behaveth himself harshly toward his daughter." It applies to a case where there has been an unjustifiable opposition to a daughter's marriage.

A. N. F., Knightsdale, N. C. 1. It is the duty of every one professing Christianity to confess Christ before men, and to join with the brethren in church bonds. Emphasis is laid many times on the value of spiritual association, and we are expressly urged "not to forsake the assembling of ourselves together." Believers should cooperate heartily for the advancement of the Kingdom, and this can only be done effectively under the auspices of the church. Any one neglecting this duty misses many privileges and much blessing. The whole Christian Church is a vast army, composed of many branches or divisions, but all under one great Commander; and if we are loyal in our devotion to Christ and eager to do him service in the world, we must work together harmoniously and unitedly. 2. Backsliding and apostasy are regarded as absolute evidence that there has never been any real and full conversion in the case. The true convert may slip and fall into sin, but will always be raised up again. Besetting sins and the wickedness of the flesh may assert themselves, but repentance will be followed by forgiveness and restoration. 3. Paul was a true Christian. His own story, as he told it, shows that from the time of Stephen's martyrdom—of which he was a witness, "consenting to his death"—he had begun to think in his heart about the new religion. He had seen how the believers suffered and died, strong in the faith. And when he was struck down on that wonderful journey to Damascus, the whole truth burst upon him like a flood of light, and the vision he then saw was the turning-point of his career. 4. The Laodicean church had fallen away from grace and become indifferent. Its usefulness had been largely destroyed by selfishness; its zeal had evaporated and it was lukewarm, being given over to material things and the pleasures of the world. There are churches today in a similar condition, which need a re-baptism and a new infusion of the Holy Spirit.

M. F., Casston, Ohio. I notice a recent quotation in the Christian Herald attributed to St. Paul, which I do not find in his epistles. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." That occurs in Prov. 23:7. Does St. Paul use the same words?

The writer of the article you refer to fell into the common error of supposing that these words occur in the New Testament. You are right in saying that they do not. Yet their message seems to belong to the New Testament more than the Old, and this is doubtless why they are usually thought of as New Testament words. Jesus placed the great emphasis on the inner life, its thoughts, feelings and motives. The apostles followed this teaching. Love, purity, honor, peace, these are inward possessions; to live a victorious life outwardly these traits must be possessed inwardly. The modern psychology recognizes the great power of unexpressed emotions and unspoken thoughts. It is scientifically as well as spiritually true that "as a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." Here is the man's real character. Thoughts have also great power over the bodily life, having much to do with sickness and health. It is not necessary to lose oneself in the vagaries of mental healing and Christian Science to find the health value of pure, unselfish, wholesome, hopeful, vigorous thinking.

J. D. G., Centralia, Mo. 1. Thales, a Greek astronomer who was born 640 years before Christ, taught that the earth was round, but believed that it was in the center of the universe. This theory was generally held until the time of Copernicus, after whom the system of astronomy now received is named. The opposition to the Copernican theory was based upon the language of Scripture, which referred to the earth as it appears to our senses, and not in the language of science. 2. The invention of the mariner's compass has been attributed to Flavio Gioja, an Italian who lived in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries; but it is said that it was in use in Europe in the twelfth century, and it is believed to have been used by the Chinese 2,000 years before that. 3. We have never heard that it was found. 4. The order of creation in Genesis corresponds in a striking manner with that disclosed by the science of geology. While the Bible is not a treatise on science, and was never meant to tell us facts about nature which we can ourselves discover by investigation, still the agreement of Genesis and geology is remarkable. 5. It would seem by the record in Genesis that the inspired writer intended to convey the idea that the first day commenced with the creation of light; and the placing of a paragraph mark at the beginning of the third verse seems to indicate that the translators held that view.

H. W. G., Teton, Mont. It is an admirable thing, as your letter suggests, when the churches sink all minor differences to unite against a common foe. This is now done very often in union revivals, in temperance and anti-vice crusades and other movements that affect the welfare of the community. We should like to see it done everywhere in every cause that would be helped by the united action of the churches.

J. A. M., Meyersdale, Pa. It would be difficult to defend the practice, which seems to be increasingly common, of photographing congregations on Sunday, although it might be claimed that it could not be done on any other day. Not knowing the circumstances of the case you mention, we can not assume to judge.

Mrs. D. L. Rathburn, Santa Rosa, Calif., writes: "In the issue of February 10 I see an answer in regard to Ingersoll in the Mail-Bag. At the time of Ingersoll's death my husband was pastor in a church in Virginia, six miles from Washington City, D. C. In the town there was a Congregational minister who was a fine lecturer, and on lecture trips he and Ingersoll would sometimes meet. This lecturer told my husband that he had been told by Mr. Ingersoll's secretary that often, after the delivery of one of his infidel lectures, he would be so wrought up that he would walk the floor saying to himself, 'What if it were true?' I was particularly interested in the departure of such a character."

J. K., Royalton, Vt. We have not seen any estimate which included all of the millions who are suffering from hunger in the countries now at war, but if, in addition to Poland and Belgium, we include Servia, Montenegro, Turkey in Europe and Asia, and the refugees in Holland and France, from ten to twelve millions would not seem to be an excessive figure. No steps have yet been taken looking to any appropriation by Congress for relief. Your suggestion of a contribution of twenty-five cents per capita from the population of this country would hardly be regarded as a practical one, although we appreciate the motive which prompted it.

Mrs. A. J. W., Murphysboro, Ill. We cannot advise in such a case. It seems to be a matter for the individual conscience.

J. C., Prairie Grove, Ark. 1. Eleven states—Illinois, Ohio, California, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Minnesota, Oregon, Colorado, Washington, New York, North Carolina—besides Hawaii and the Philippines, have the Torrens system. 2. The Torrens system clears up the title by a court proceeding once for all, while the abstract system guarantees the title only so far as the makers of the abstract have been able to ascertain the facts.

Mrs. A. J. W., Murphysboro, Ill. The laws of the various states make provision for such cases, defining the rights of each party. The Scripture passages referring to the subject may be found in Gen. 3:24; Matt. 19:5; 19:6; 5:32; 19:9; Mark 10:7, 8, 9, 11; Eph. 5:31; Mal. 10:9; I Cor. 7:11, 39; Luke 16:18; Rom. 7:2, 3.

The Light of the World

THE first book to come from the first printing press in Europe was Gutenberg's Bible. In those early days (when America was still to be discovered), the publishing of Bi es was attended with some difficulties, and the sel g with still more. There were those who thought th the common man had no business with the ins red Word of God; that his ears were not attuned to e message nor his mind equipped to interpret it. Bu there were others who saw in the unchained Word th only hope of the world. Tyndall and Wycliff put th Bible into the hands of the men and women of En and, and Luther opened the Scriptures to the pe le of Germany. The demand for the Book could no e denied, and the editions of the Bible multiplied in pite of prohibitions and burnings. He y the Seventh of England bought on entire edition and burned it, and th printer used the proceeds of the sal to produce a still larger edition. Th convictions and purposes which dr e the pilgrims and the Huguenots an most of the first settlers to America ere built upon personal knowledge of hose Scriptures which once had be denied to men. These men, co ng to America, founded a civilizatio whose cornerstone was the Word of od, and the family group without a ble in the colonial days of America wa an unusual one, albeit the Book ha frequently been purchased at gr sacrifice.

he first Bible printed in America wa in an Indian language, translated by ohn Elliott, pioneer missionary to th Indians, and published at Cambr ge, Mass., the New Testament in 16 , the entire Bible in 1663. In 1688 on William Bradford proposed to pr an English Bible by subscription, th rice of the book to the subscribers be g twenty shillings, or a pound st ing. In 1777, during the Revolutio ary War, there were so few Bibles in he little group of states that C gress voted to print 30,000 copies. E n this was found impracticable. Ty and paper were wanting, and by wa of compromise 20,000 Bibles were th ordered to be imported from Europe by authority of ongress, the reason given being that "its use was so niversal and its importance so great." But even th ould not be done owing to the war embargo. The wo was then undertaken in 1782 by Mr. Robert Ai en of Philadelphia as a private enterprise. The bo s were few and very dear.

s early as 1801 Matthew Carey of Philadelphia, se ng the growing need of the public for the Bible, ar nged for its publication and distribution among hi ellow citizens. Various Bible societies to extend su work sprang up in the colonies, patterned after th British and Foreign Bible Society, which was fo ed in London the 7th of March, 1804, the first so ty in the United States being formed in Philade hia in 1808. By June, 1816, there were 128 such so ties in the United States. Thirty-five of these lo societies united to form the American Bible Sc ty, and eighty-four became auxiliary to it during th irst year of its existence.

WHILE the life of the original colonies had been permeated with religious feeling and the Bible ha occupied an acknowledged place in all public and pr ate life, yet the pioneers, who had pressed forward ac ss the mountains into the rich plains of the W tern Reserve, and through the valley of the Ohio to he mountains of Kentucky and Tennessee, in many cases left behind them this Book, which had been the chief support of the civilization they had left, and in other cases they came to forget it in the struggle to build a new life in the wilderness, and there began to be a genuine fear that in consequence the civilization beyond the mountains would become a godless civilization. Rev. Samuel J. Mills became greatly impressed with the need for adequate organization for the distribution of the Bible, and in the year 1815, under the auspices of the New Jersey Bible Society, a plan for a National Bible Society was formally proposed. Hon. Elias Boudinot, president of the New Jersey Society (president of the Continental Congress in 1783 and signer of the treaty of peace with Great Britain), was sponsor for the new movement, and notice was given of a convention to be held in the city of New York on the 8th of May, 1816. Delegates attended this convention from thirty-five of the older societies, and the convention met in the Consistory Room of the Reformed Dutch Church on Garden Street (now Exchange Place). As a result of two days' deliberation the thought of the convention was expressed in the following resolution:

The Board room of the American Bible Society containing a library of rare Bibles, and paintings of noted patrons

"Resolved, That it is expedient to establish without delay a general Bible Institution for the circulation of the Holy Scriptures without note or comment."

A committee was appointed to recommend a constitution, which was adopted on the tenth of the month, and on the eleventh of May, 1816, the board of thirty-six managers met in the new City Hall of New York, now the old City Hall, and elected the first officers of the American Bible Society. Boudinot was the first president, and Hon. John Jay the first vice-president. Among those who made up this convention were James Fennimore Cooper and Dr. Lyman Beecher. The Bible Society was organized to sell Bibles at never more than cost to those who were able to pay for them, and to supply Bibles without cost to those whose circumstances called for such consideration. But the Society has done far more; it has sent messengers at great expense into the hidden corners of far countries that it might give the Bible to those whose very poverty spoke their need.

IT is interesting to note in passing that a certain Frenchman named Voltaire essayed the dangerous rôle of prophet at about the time of the organization of this society. He prophesied that in a hundred years the Bible would be an unknown book; that there would be no further sale for it. And at about the same time one Thomas Paine declared that he had torn the prophets and the Gospels limb from limb and had left no shred of argument remaining; that he had utterly destroyed them. Wise as these men may have been in purely human affairs, they had not even the beginnings of that heavenly wisdom through which alone a proper appreciation of the Word of God is gained, and lacking this, they wrote themselves down less prescient than a certain braying animal who once carried a prophet to bless those whom he had sought to curse.

The first depository of the American Bible Society was the agent's office, corner Cedar and Nassau Streets, New York. Then a larger room, seven feet by nine, was secured at No. 10 Cliff Street. The next move was to a room twenty feet square in Hanover Street. After several other removals, the first Bible House was erected on Nassau Street in 1823. It was soon outgrown. In 1847 the site occupied by the present Bible House was secured for $100,000, and the new Bible House was occupied in May of 1853. The building cost $204,000 and, within ten years, rentals had entirely covered the cost. About twenty-six years ago the building was thoroughly overhauled and a sixth story was added. It is occupied by the American Bible Society, the Christian Herald, and over 125 other religious and secular businesses.

THE American Bible Society was organized with ten standing committees, and the work of the society was carried on through these committees and auxiliary societies, of which at one time there were two thousand two hundred. The records of these auxiliaries are records of faith that refused to be denied, of service that knew neither race nor nation, and of sacrifice that left nothing reserved in the service of the King. But these societies performed their work and were superseded early in the twentieth century by field agents, of whom there are now five in the United States. There are now in existence only about twelve local Bible societies.

During the first year of its existence, the American Bible Society received $37,779.35 and published 6,410 copies of the Bible and portions of the Scripture. During the Civil War the demand for the Scriptures increased and multiplied and Bibles printed at the Bible House, New York, were the only merchandise which, during more than three years of civil strife, the Union Army permitted to go through its lines to the people of the Confederacy, and the only merchandise which the Confederate States were willing to receive from the people of the north. In 1866 the receipts of the society were $642,625.25, and the total number of Bibles and portions printed was 1,150,528, a number which was not exceeded until twenty years later. In its ninety-ninth year the Society, although its income was slightly reduced, published and distributed more Bibles and portions of Scripture than ever before in its history, the total distribution being 2,707,739.

Since the organization of the first Bible society more than 400,000,000 copies of the Scripture and portions have been printed and distributed, of which the American Bible Society has produced 109,926,214, the British and Foreign Bible Society 263,565,501, and the American Baptist Publication Society more than 1,000,000. The figures of the Trinitarian, of the French Society, and of other smaller organizations are not available, but if these figures could be obtained they would doubtless bring the total in excess of 400,000,000. The total issued by all agencies, including private publishers, during 1915 is estimated at 32,000,000 copies.

The Bible is now being printed in not less than six hundred languages and dialects. The American Bible Society itself has printed the Scriptures in more than eighty-five languages and dialects. At the present time the British and Foreign Bible Society, through its German branch, is printing Bibles in Russian for the Russian prisoners in Germany. The American Bible Society has already distributed to the soldiers in Europe more than 400,000 copies of the New Testament, which have been paid for by the Sunday school children of the world.

The Bible has been prepared for the blind in three systems of embossed letters, and from the very first year of the Society efforts have been made to supply missionaries to American Indians with copies of the Scripture. The Delawares, Mohawks, Ojibwas, Senecas, Cherokees, Choctaws, Dakotas and Sioux were all supplied in the first twenty-five years of the Society's life. After the Civil War, a special department was created to supply the freedmen with the Book which they had learned to love, but which few of them possessed and fewer could read. The immigrant, too, has found his Bible awaiting him. At every port of entry the Bible man is ready with Testaments and Bibles in the languages of all the nations which send their sons to America.

In 1832 the Board of Managers decided that the Society was under obligation to supply Scriptures to all American missions which ask aid. This decision led to the early equipment of American missions in Turkey, Persia, India, Burma, China, South Africa and the Sandwich Islands. The Society has now plants for the printing of the Scriptures in China and in the Levant. The twelve foreign agencies of the Society at last reports directed the energies of 1,478 agents, sub-agents and colporteurs. These colporteurs are the commercial travelers of the Kingdom. There is no danger which they will not brave, no path too rugged and no wilderness too wild. Wherever there are men there is need, and wherever there is need the colporteurs press on their way. Discouragements are only cause for greater effort. Abuse, persecutions, misunderstanding, opposition of every kind, all these are part of the day's work, and the day's work is the spreading of the Word, and the spreading of the Word is planting the knowledge of God and of his Christ. Wherever the far-flung line of civilization has advanced its farthest scouts, and beyond these, the Book has gone in the hands of the faithful Bible men, preparing the way for the further march of civilization and preparing men and women for the message of the missionary, the preacher and the prophet.

The Bible in Civic Affairs

PUTTING aside the whole immense field of the Bible in the home, the Sunday school, and the church, let us take note of its place in the civic customs and institutions of our land. What a tribute to its cultural, moral, and molding influence is involved in the reading of a selection from this Book, generation after generation, at the opening of practically all our public schools! It is true that in recent years, chiefly in some of the newer states, there has been a recession from this usage—or perhaps it were better to say a concession to a relatively small number of objectors. In twelve states of the Union Bible reading is definitely provided for by legislative enactment. Twenty-seven states have no law on the subject, but generally observe the custom. The Bible is by due legal process understood to be excluded from the schools in the states of Arizona, Nevada, Idaho, and Montana; and California, Washington, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Illinois. A few states are not included in these statistics, doubtless because legislation was pending, as is markedly true at the present time, when the trend seems to be to put Bible reading more fully into the public schools.

While the situation for the reading daily of a passage from the Bible in a very large proportion of our public schools is distinctly encouraging and the outlook bright, it does not reach to instruction in the Scriptures, for it is without comment. Therefore the new movement in the high schools, aiming at a broad cultural knowledge of the Bible for which credit can be given the same as for other studies, marks a surprising and splendid advance. Starting in the progressive states west of the Mississippi, about 1911, it reveals somewhat different forms in North Dakota, Colorado, and Kansas. In the North Dakota plan of Bible study by high school students, no text-book but the Bible is required, and any version—King James, Revised, or Douay (Catholic)—can be used. The state teaching force provides a syllabus outlining the study, and at the close send printed questions, and the student's answers to these is his examination paper, which if passed makes a credit on his high school course. The pastors, Sunday schools and young people's societies give the instruction and conduct the classes, or the work can be done at home. In North Dakota, in the five years from 1911 to 1915, a total of 513 examination papers have been sent in by high school students, and 448 have passed.

Something like this plan is at work in Kansas and Colorado, in the high schools of Des Moines, Iowa, and in the Lakewood High School of Cleveland, Ohio; and the movement bids fair to spread rapidly to most if not all the states of the Union. The teachers of South Dakota are already considering how it can be extended to the elementary grades.

THE Bible is coming back, after a long interval since earlier days, into the regular courses in universities and colleges, simply by the force of its own enduring merits. Naturally the higher institutions of learning largely established or maintained by the churches are the first to show this new trend. Taking this class of institutions in New England, New York, and Ohio as a fair test of the whole country, it had just been found (1915) that four-fifths of the preparatory schools, two-thirds of the colleges, and one-half of the universities give genuine and ample recognition to the Bible as a cultural subject the same as other studies. And if the Bible, as has been shown, is likely to become one of the studies that can be chosen in the elementary and high schools supported by public taxation, as a part of the regular course, there is no reason why it may not at the final stages of this movement also form an elective study in the regular courses of colleges and universities supported by the state, the same as it is coming to do in the advanced educational institutions of the churches.

ONE day a man by the name of Diaz saw the end of a tiny piece of paper projecting from the ashes in an ash can along the side of the road. He pulled it out and looked at it and found upon its two sides a part of a strange story of a God who loved men well enough to send his Son into their world to save them. He was interested and did not rest until he had found a whole book like the one from which that leaf had been torn. Today this man, Diaz, is an active member of an evangelical church in a leading city in Chile.

THE experiences of the hospital and the prison may not be common in the sense that we all pass through them, but they concrete and make vivid the suffering and failure, the weakness and sin that everywhere pervade human life, into the midst of which the Word of God comes like a comforting angel or a reproving yet saving messenger from heaven. Let us for a little follow and observe the divine Book as it is taken into these fields of anguish and fear, of bondage and despair.

The uniformed woman worker of the New York Bible Society who visits the hospitals of the city, distributing the Scriptures, in one month cheered with her presence the following: Bellevue, Flower, German, Gouverneur, Infirmary for Women, Knickerbocker, Lincoln, Sydenham, Women's, giving out nearly 1,200 portions of the Scriptures. During another month the Word conveyed by her hands covered fourteen different languages: English, Bohemian, Finnish, French, German, Greek, Hungarian, Italian, Polish, Russian, Slovak, Spanish, Swedish, and Yiddish.

One patient said to the missionary: "I have read forty-five pages of St. Matthew's Gospel in one day, and gained so much help and comfort from it t t it was hard to put it down." Another said: 'The Gospel you left me last week was a godsend, for ter reading and reading it the night before my s ous operation, I felt strengthened to go through wit it.'"

Now let us conceive, if it is possible, the comf ing and transforming ministry of the Scriptures in l spitals, jails, and prisons from one end of the land t the other, chiefly through the unceasing activities the representatives of the American Bible Society. We transport ourselves to the South, among the c red population, and a worker says: "Tears stream wn the cheeks of the prisoners as we visit their lls. . . . Every day I see more and more the ne of faithful distribution, and oft ask myself the question, 'What uld the world be without the Bo ?'"

Next we place ourselves ith the Bible visitor among the ree or four thousand Mexican en, women and children in the c ention camp at Fort Bliss, ne El Paso, Texas, and see them r ive 1,800 Gospels, Testaments nd Bibles with great eagerness. till farther to the west we reac Los Angeles and witness in the c nty hospital the welcome give by forty-four different nation ties to several hundred Bibles, T staments, and portions distribu l in 1914, while many others ere given out in the jails. Once re, by a mighty leap we plac urselves at Indianapolis, Ind. nd accompany the worker as h oes to the police station every S lay morning and holds a C pel service, at which over fty were converted during 1915 and 1,400 Gospels ere given out.

MULTITUDES have the experience of goi to the guest rooms of our hotels, often in st nge cities and places, with unexpected care, responsil ty, or temptation attending or confronting them. ow strengthening and assuring to meet there this wo erful Book, with its unfailing cheer and counsel! has become the distinctive mission of the Gideons the ten thousand Christian commercial travelers sociated together, who wear for recognition the lue button with the white pitcher and torch, to se hat every hotel guest room in America has a Bible. ley have now reached a total of 305,203 Bibles plac in the hotels of the United States and Canada.

Many are the grateful self-revelations of tel guests, showing how marvelous has been the he ul, saving power of these copies of the Scriptures. ust a few weeks ago this signed record was found o the fly-leaf of one of these Bibles down in Birming m, Ala.: "May God bless the man who p ed this book here. I am a young lady, tw tyone years old, fatherless and moth ss. Tonight this book saved me from t ing a wrong step. May the next reade ind in it the comfort I did." Needless t say that the local Gideon Camp now hold his copy in its keeping, sacred for high ses because of this inscription.

A man went into a hotel in San Fran co, secured a room with the intention of mmitting suicide, and laid a vial of p son on the table while making preparatio for the final act. When he stepped to the ble he discovered that accidentally (?) he had put th ial upon a Gideon Bible. As he opened it, his eyes fell on the reference (one of the "prescriptions" on the G on slip pasted inside the front cover): "If discourag or in trouble, read Psalm 126 and John 14." He read ese two selections, threw the bottle of poison out he window, knelt, and then and there gave his hea to God, and is now an active church-member a a good citizen. Numerous are the instances ike these, showing the invaluable service of the tel Bibles.

As far as is known, the largest shipment of a gle book ever made occurred when the two carloads mposed of 25,000 American Standard Bibles were nt by the publishers from New York to San Fran co, first to form the Gideon "exhibit" at the Int national Sunday School Convention, and then t be used to "bible" the hotels of California.

IT is doubtful whether any single agency, outsi of the great Bible Societies, has done as much to ard the circulation of the Bible in the last twenty yea as the Christian Herald. From 1889 to 1910, it is timated that it put in circulation annually not less an 60,000 Bibles, Testaments and Gospels, both ck and red letter. The various Bible societies ve admitted that from 1897 onward this journal as been one of the most influential factors in prom ng Bible circulation, and making God's Word the ost widely read book on the North American conti nt.

The whole world is now familiar with the sto of the Red Letter Bible, which was the personal pr ect of the late Dr. Louis Klopsch. All his life an a nt Bible student, he conceived the idea of printi a Bible which would show in red, first, all the proph ies relative to the Saviour, and second, the words act lly spoken by him. The Red Letter Bible has been el-ened throughout the world, and is now printed in eral languages.

n a similar way the New York Bible Society takes e of the hotels of its city and has furnished in the few years a total of 33,000 to 530 hotels in Manhtan and the Bronx.

HE last field of civic experience to be glanced at holds the immensely impressive spectacle of the ble making objective man's sense that God, who has gen us his inviolate word in the Bible, takes note ven man gives his solemn and deliberate word as a wness in court, or when pledging h fidelity in a high office of plic trust. The Bible stands as aitness between a man and his fows that he pledges himself to hor and truth, whether it be the oh of the humblest person about t testify, or the President-elect o he nation, from Washington to Vson, as he assumes his high oe.

ightly distributed, God's Word w accomplish its destined purpe in some measure in every e c sphere into which the intere the aspiration, the tact, and t prayers and sincere, patient e rts of God's children shall cvey it. Take the beautiful sgestiveness of the service of o Christian man's heart in Nv York as the inspiration to y, to find your field. The writer ds not even know this man's ne, but has only heard the sry of his deeds. It is told of h that he scans the obituary nices in several papers, selects tl name of some one of those nrest to the departed, marks a Gpel at its most comforting vses, and mails it to the person seted, but not with his own ne.

The Vernacular Bible

BEFORE the printing of the Bible there was no English language. It was the Bible th standardized all the dialects of Britain and that bnd them together into a living speech; and it was the Ble that was the foundation of the education and culte of England. As the English historian Green says, "he English people became a people of a book, and th book was the Bible." To a large degree the same is ue of Germany, but it is not necessary to go back to he middle ages to find the Bible forming a nation's cure and fixing its language. On many of the rsion fields, especially in Africa, the laguages of the natives had never been reced to writing until the missionary pvided them with an alphabet in order tl the Bible might be translated in their tongues. The Bible has then bome both the language text-book and tl spiritual guide of these African nations. I mission schools the world over the Bible is he language text-book. The people of tl mission lands want their children to len the Western tongue, and they send tln to the school. They learn the missiary's language, but in the learning th find the missionary's God.

ew of us realize the extent of the labor wch has been necessary in order that the Ble message might come to us in our own tgue and still be the message which was dvered in the tongue of the original msenger. The Bible was originally wten in Hebrew and Greek. An early Ln translation has been of great assistae in later translations into the languages of Europe, and our English Bible owes mh to the Latin Vulgate. Today the Be is being translated into tongues for wh it is necessary to create even an ahabet, tongues which, although human lifhas many common terms, are yet barren of ny expression for the deeper spiritual trhs. In a little book called "The Book a the Sword," issued by the British and Feign Bible Society, some of the difficies of translation are outlined.

ishop Steere, who was himself a great msionary translator, said: "Our work mt be all unsound without a vernacular Be." In translating the Bible into the Htentot tongue, it was necessary to chge Jesus to Jesub because in Hottentot a word eng in "s" signifies the female, and the word must er in "b" to indicate the male sex. In translating th Bible for the Zulus and for some other aboriginal peoles, it is necessary to have two versions, one for tl women and one for the men. The Zulu law compe a married woman to cut herself off from her faer-in-law and all her husband's male relations. She is not allowed to pronounce their names even mentally. As a result, there is a distinct dialect current among Zulu women. Rev. Lind, in translating the Bible into the Mardia tongue in India, found it necessary to resort to all kinds of devices to obtain from the Mardias the names of different objects. He says, "I grunted like a pig, quacked like a duck, neighed like a horse, howled like a jackal, and had to exercise all my artistic abilities in drawing various kinds of animals, birds and insects." In the Nupe language of Africa, there was no word for "soul." The word had to be translated "life"; and for "conscience" the nearest equivalent was "stomach." In translating the Bible for the Bemba tribe in northern Rhodesia, no terms could be found that would convey the proper idea of "love," "grace" or "holy." But the word "redemption" had an exact counterpart in the Bemba language because slavery is a part of their life and no slave is set free until redeemed by some payment. In Papua, the ancient tribal government is entirely without authority. There is no compulsion in their native life, and their language had no words in which to translate the passage in the parable which says to "Compel them to come in." The phrase was expressed in their tongue, "Urge them (literally, make their livers rise by quarreling words) to enter in." Another difficulty lies in the modification of tongues in the dialects which render a Testament, good in one village, almost useless in a village a few miles away In Africa, along the south coast, in a distance of 350 miles among people all of whom speak the Motu language, there are four dialects into all of which the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles have been translated.

A landmark in religious history: the Bible House, New York, home of the American Bible Society, the Christian Herald and other institutions

HE was an Italian, and his little shop in San Francisco had all of his heart. One bright morning a man entered and offered him a book. He looked at it and said, "No," for he was a Roman Catholic. But the man persisted and would not be denied. Finally he thought, "I will get rid of the man, I will buy the book, and when he is gone I will throw it away." So he purchased it—the cheapest book the man could sell him—and turned to his work, glad to be rid of so pestering a fellow. But the man stayed. He said, "Now I have sold you the book, I will show you how to use it." And beginning in the Old Testament, he showed him prophecy and fulfilment, and made the story of the Book so vital that the Italian became interested. He had not known that the Bible was such a book, and he promised to read it. He did read it, and the message of the Book found lodgment in his heart. He sought and found the Saviour, and then he felt that this new happiness which had entered into his life must be shared, and he started a little mission in San Francisco. But this did not satisfy him. He would do more. He would go to the unevangelized in some country where the Gospel was little known, and would tell them the story of the Christ as he had learned it from the Book.

He gathered together all of his goods and turned everything that he possessed into cash, and with $85,000 in gold he set sail for Argentina. After looking over the ground he offered to found with his money a school for the Indians of Argentina. But the law of Argentina did not permit the granting of a deed to any church or mission not recognized by Roman authority, and his gift could not be accepted. Disappointed, but more earnest still, he went to Bolivia, where he found the law more favorable, and where his money was accepted as an endowment for a Protestant educational mission to the Indians of Bolivia. Thus the Bible sold to Antonio Shiriatti has founded a school which will spread the light of the Gospel through many years to come into the far corners of South America.

But no matter what the differences of speech or the variations of language, one thing has been found true, that while "mankind may have a thousand tongues, it has only one heart, and that heart understands one language, the whole world over, the language of Divine love." This language is capable of taming the most ferocious of people and of civilizing the most absolute savages. The little island of Niué, which Captain Cook called Savage Island, because its people were more like wild boars than human beings, received its first complete Bible ten years ago and the islanders are transformed. They are now human beings. The war in Europe has brought to millions of men a vision of the deeper meaning of the Bible. A trooper in a Scottish cavalry regiment said, "Every time I use this sword of steel, it gets the blunter, but every time I use this sword of the Spirit, it gets the sharper." "Two million Testaments, psalters and Gospels have been circulated in more than a dozen different countries since the war began, and the total rises every day. . . . Nearly thirty different languages are current among the soldiers of the many races now fighting, but in every one of these tongues the Society has been printing and circulating the Scriptures for many years. The Bibles go to the men at the front and to the prisoners of war in many different countries, to alien civilians in detention camps and to refugees." A Russian princess, wondering at the comfort which the Psalms brought to wounded men in the hospital at Petrograd, asked one of the men, "Why are you so fond of them?" He answered, "I had a psalter. It was in my pocket during many battles. We read the Psalms before we went out to fight. They helped us. They prepared us to die." On an ancient sword in the Cabinet de Medailles at Paris there is this inscription, "There is no conquerer but God."

His Word Shall Be Glorified

NAME something untouched at any point by the Bible. Can it be done? Is there anything that enters into the sum of human activities that is not either influenced for good by the Word of God, or combated by it as evil? What one thing is there which has a place in human society that has remained outside the influence of the Bible?

If there is any such thing, it will be found only in those remote outskirts of human life as yet unreached by even the first rays of civilization. There may be, and there are, some tribes of beings still of the lowest order of human life, almost if not quite incapable of response to influences outside of their untutored minds. And yet, in a very real sense, even to them the influence of the Bible does extend, in that men are concerned to find such human beings and lift them out of their low estate.

In the personality of a great organization, the history of the printed Book itself for one hundred years is being celebrated in New York City at the present time. The story of the manufacture and distribution of the Bible has no equal in any other industry. Just to describe to what extent the book is spread throughout the world, without one word as to the influence it exerts, is to tell a wonderful story. But such a story could not be so told, because the very mainspring of the industry is the influence of the Bible. It was the influence of that book upon individuals that caused the printing and distribution of it ever to begin. It is that same influence and that alone which accounts for the unprecedented labor which has entered into the mere matter of producing the volumes themselves. The story of the impress which the Bible has made upon all life simply never can be told. A feeble index only can be attempted.

And first would be named the many and great religious bodies which have the Bible as their constitution. Perhaps some would say the millions of individuals who govern their lives by its teachings should first be named.

After individuals and organizations would come the literature which the Bible has prompted: the

Simon Legree in Mexico

By J. F. DERRICK

I HAPPENED to be employed as interpreter by a few gentlemen organizing the B—- L - Railroad; translating the minutes of their directors' meetings. There were a few Americans who had invested in the stock, and who were directors.

Arriving at Vera Cruz, T— de la T—, vice-president of the proposed road, and I prepared for the voyage to "E—— E——," the vice-president's vast estate. The voyage seemed to me endless, and I finally asked from sheer desperation if we would ever stop.

C——, a small town of about twenty-five hundred inhabitants, received my employer T—— with some enthusiasm, for, as I learned later, C—— was to be the starting point of the projected B— L - Railroad. Our horses came from E— E— at midnight, and we arrived there at half past four in the morning of the following day. Six days had been spent in covering a distance, all told, of about eighty-five miles.

Tired, sore, weary, and homesick with a homesickness that is indescribable, imagine my disappointment upon finding a hard wooden bed instead of a mattress! A dirt floor had the home of this rich Mexican planter; no water, and no improvements of any nature whatsoever. The house was made of strips of wood nailed together, some with holes in the planks, and in instances the strips far enough apart to admit of snakes and many species of insects that abound in that part of Mexico. Tired as I was, I would have needed but little encouragement to undergo as much more fatigue to get back to civilization.

In the morning, after a miserable effort at cleanliness, I sauntered outside of my compartment to find my employer waiting for me with a smile, as though immensely pleased, it seemed to me, at my haggard appearance. As we talked, I was amazed to see men and women being brought out of what I supposed were lodges for workmen, for they were all built alike. These men and women, thin, sick, scarred and tattered, presented a most horrible spectacle. They were being lined up for inspection by the owner of the estate. The major-domo reported that these two hundred and fifty men, and as many women, had behaved in such a manner as to merit being whipped and put in irons or the calaboose. This latter is two heavy pieces of wood, rounded out in opposite directions, large enough to admit the neck. They may be made to hold six or eight prisoners at one time. The arrival of Don T—— had occasioned the report of the major-domo. I began to wonder what would come next, for I suddenly realized that these were slaves.

He asked them why they did not behave themselves, but no one vouchsafed a reply. Turning to the major-domo, he said: "I order their release and full rations in honor of the occasion."

Hardly had this set of most wretched people been released and sent on their way, when I turned to see four hundred men with hardly any clothes on, marching toward us from what seemed to me an impenetrable forest. They had come from the sugar-cane plantations to pay homage to their owner. Each addressed him as "mi amo" (my master). They were lined up and inspected. My friend seemed to feel his importance, for he addressed them as follows:

"I am glad to see you all. I hope you have done your work well while I was in America. If I find that you have not done well I shall teach each of you a lesson." After turning to the bookkeeper and making a few inquiries, he said: "To prove to you that I want you to be happy today, I have ordered the bookkeeper to give each one of you one dollar, full rations, and a suit of clothes to consist of a pair of trousers and a shirt. You may also have on account anything that you wish." After a yell of "Gracias, mi amo!" (thanks, my master or my owner) they filed to the office for their dollar, the only one some of them had seen for years, or held as his own.

These strange things filled me with curiosity, and after dinner I sauntered into the office of the bookkeeper. Manuel A——, who seemed friendly enough, and eager to know about life in the United States. Open-mouthed and amazed he listened to my stories, and asked all manner of questions. But his surprise and eagerness were nothing in comparison to my desire to find out what the occurrences of the day really meant, and why these poor wretches had to be put in chains and shut up in dark, filthy hovels.

The next day I set out for a walk. I had proceeded about one hundred yards from the main building when I heard a voice. Turning I found that I was being watched, for the Amo called to me, asking where I was going.

I replied, "For a walk, as the morning is so beautiful."

"No," said he, "we have work to do. We must prepare to go to C——, as a meeting of the directors of the railroad will be held there today at three o'clock."

At C—— I found there was to be no meeting. I concluded that my suspicions were correct, for after giving orders to stable the horses, T—— called me into a private office. Taking a seat he said, "You know, as matters stand, that there will be no meeting of directors today as was proposed some days ago; but we will remain here until evening and so have a chance to see Señor G——," the latter being a sort of judge at C——.

Some time had elapsed when Señor G—— entered. After the usual greeting he and T—— entered into serious conversation. I found that it had to do with one of Don T——'s slaves, who had run away. From what I could glean from their attitude, there had been some trouble regarding one previous runaway, who, it seemed, reached San Juan Bautista and complained to the authorities there of the treatment he had received at E— E—. The proposed plan seemed to be to prevent this second case from reaching the capital. San Juan Bautista is the capital of Tabasco.

AT the end of six weeks, I had made many friends in the neighboring estates or plantations of sugar-cane. I soon became quite well acquainted with my surroundings at E— E— and by giving aid to many of these poor people I had gained their confidence. Their confidence was an asset, indeed; for I found out much through my assuring them of my friendship and sympathy.

The major-domo (or overseer), the bodeguero, or storekeeper, and those in charge of all the departments (there were boiler-makers, mechanics, sugar-refiners and rum-distillers), constituted the upper or more privileged class. Because of their intelligence they were not subjected to the treatment of the common laboring class, neither were they bought nor sold. There were two Spaniards among these who were, of course, immune, and could go and come whenever they cared. Being a foreigner myself, I felt that if I could gain the confidence of these two, I could learn very much, since they had nothing to fear but a discharge.

The whippings were still going on, and both men and women were continually being put in irons. But care had been taken to keep one from taking place in my presence. However, one morning I was awakened by the cries of a woman in distress. I quickly dressed and ran directly toward the place. Reaching the little hut, I pushed down the door and entered. What a sight! A young woman had been stripped of her clothing and had been almost murdered by the overseer. Too weak now to even groan, she lay panting, bleeding from the cuts and bruises inflicted by this brute.

Recovering from his surprise, he wanted to know what business called me there. For answer I brushed him aside and did all that I could to revive the injured woman. Running back to my bed, I grabbed the bed clothes, and from the medicine chest of the store I took restoratives and rushed back to the dying woman, only to find that she had been removed.

The system was so well managed that for a fortnight I did not learn where they had taken this poor woman. Then I found out only that she had been buried. My investigation proved that she had paid with her life the price of striving to preserve her womanhood from dishonor. Who can tell how many more had paid the same price? No one seemed to mourn her loss but her mother and father, who, with breaking hearts, were turned out into the fields at five o'clock each morning.

Besides the parents of this young woman, the only one to feel the loss was the master, Don T——, who figured in round numbers that he had lost four hundred dollars; and he felt it the more as he could have received three hundred and fifty dollars for her, but had refused it. However, he too made the best of the situation and placed the transaction to his profit and loss account.

I CONTINUED at my regular work. Being in the same office with the bookkeeper, I became quite friendly with him, and through him I got a chance to see the books. I found that every man, woman and child on the estate had an account against him, with the exception only of those who, as previously stated, were not laborers.

I found later that Señor G—— also had a plantation, the "S—— L——," and that the same methods and system prevailed in his establishment as here. This fact made it clear why he could not afford to prosecute any crime that might come to his knowledge.

From the books it appeared that laborers were brought from other states, Chiapas, Sonora and others. These laborers were procured through agents, sent to the various places with alluring stories of good pay and happy life; and so well were these stories told that agents often return after an absence of four or five weeks with seventy-five or eighty men. But these men would become so involved in debt that few, if any, would ever return to their homes and families left behind. Later these men find it necessary to send for their families in the hope that, with the aid of their wives, and in some instances a son or daughter old enough to work, some day they may get out of debt and be again free. But these poor people are doomed to perpetual disappointment. The case of José de la Cruz will show how futile an attempt to work out of debt is. The method is as follows:

In account with José de la Cruz

1905
Sept. 15	Pasaje de Chiapas efectivo	$75.00
Sept. 16	Mantencion a la familia y género para uso de ellos	25.00
Sept. 17	En efectivo J. de la Cruz	5.00
Sept. 19	Mantención durante el viaje	10.00
	Total	$115.00

On arriving at E— E— the worker would hand a slip with figures like the above to the master. Thus it is seen that before José de la Cruz did one day of work he was in debt one hundred and fifteen dollars. He agreed to work for fifty cents per day and rations. These, as before stated, were wholly inadequate. There were many other necessities that must be had. He therefore added more to his debit column by taking on credit those things he might need during "pay day" intervals, the first and fifteenth of each month. José de la Cruz's wages averaged fifteen do per month. His total wage for his year was one hundred and eighty lars; his expenses during the same including wearing apparel and nec ties, amounted to two hundred eight dollars. Adding to this his i account, his debt became three hun and twenty-three dollars, and deduc one hundred and eighty dollars, amount earned, left him in debt hundred and forty-three dollars, a crease of twenty-eight dollars over initial debt after a year's work.

His bill was no larger because he not been sick, although he had subjected to a few whippings. This man, being told the amount of his thought that his wife, who was sti Chiapas, could help him pay it But to send for her, he needed mo The house, ever ready to advance gave him a loan of seventy dol Two weeks later his wife arrived. presence added to his expenses. weekly expenses had been about dollars; now they averaged five do and a half.

The work done by women was same as that done by men: feeding mills with sugar-cane, unloading tr and cars, and labor in the fields as gathering corn, beans, cocoa and co Their pay was twenty cents per day is seen at a glance that the help an pated by the husband was reduce nothing. In the case of José de la the account stood, one year after arrival of his wife, as follows:

Traveling expenses advanced to José de la Cruz in cash for his wife, Maria de la Cruz	$7
Balance due T. de la T—— T—— year ending Sept. 15, 1906	14
Cash and merchandise up to date	28
Medicines
Total	$40
Twelve months' work at $15.00 per month $180.00	18
Bal. a fuo a la casa	$22

This amount stood against José Cruz after the second year. Up to time his wife had worked continuo for ten months, at a wage of about dollars and twenty cents per mont total of fifty-two dollars. Every one an account in his own name. Ta advantage of this, she took jew dresses, shawls, and other articles to extent of seventy-five dollars and tw cents. Her earnings deducted left h debt, independent of her husband's debtedness, twenty-three dollars twenty cents.

ALTHOUGH José de la Cruz had sick, according to the record during the three years following, for a iod of six weeks, he managed to re his expenses. He owed the house hundred and twenty-nine dollars. wife's account, averaging about the after her first ten months, amounte ninety-five dollars and twenty- cents. When a laborer found an am of this size against him, he would at become discouraged, feeling, and ju too, that he would never be able to off the debt. Such a debt was c enough for plotting to run away.

The point aimed at by the sys seemed to be to virtually own the w ers. The moment a victim was ca in the traps so cleverly set for the wary, he was a slave for the rest of life. There was not a laborer who not owe the house a balance at the of each year, ranging from about dollars to sometimes six or seven dred. This situation was brought a by over-charging the workers for c modities obtained at the store, kept this purpose only, for the same modities could be purchased at st about two miles from the estate a much cheaper rate, they were allowed to buy them elsewhere.

BRITISH HIGH COURT UPHOLDS INTERNATIONAL LAW. In a recent decision the British Privy Council, hearing an appeal from a prize court decision, ruled that orders in council should have no standing in prize courts if in conflict with recognized international law. If this ruling stands and is adhered to by the British prize courts it will remove many of the questions now pending between the British and American governments because of interference with neutral rights under the orders in council. The attorneys for the American claimants in the British prize courts had been advised not to attack the legality of the orders in council, on the ground that they might prejudice their own cases.

INSPECTION OF CREAMERIES PROPOSED. A resolution is now pending in the House of Representatives in Washington providing for a committee of Congress which shall investigate whether there are conditions prevailing in dairies and dairy products which seriously menace health, and whether Federal inspection and supervision are necessary. It is charged that a large majority of creameries are unsanitary, that a great deal of butter is made from cream that is dirty, decomposed or very sour, and that a great quantity of oils and fats are being fraudulently worked into the butter.

THE PROOF WAS IN THE EATING. Mrs. L. Brackett Bishop, of Chicago, once had a beautiful theory that working girls could provide for themselves "deliciously satisfying" meals at thirty-three cents a day. The girls said they couldn't. Mrs. Bishop took a week to prove it, and at the end of the week she retired to the shelter of her apartments admitting that she had lost her appetite because she had not had enough to eat. Carrying the investigation further, it was found that the lowest cost for a day's food for a girl in Chicago was forty cents, which is the cost to the Salvation Army of running their women's boarding-home, purchasing everything at wholesale. It was found that a young woman could not hope to buy sufficient nourishing food for less than fifty cents a day, and that the cost might run as high as seventy or eighty cents.

SEES JAPAN IN CHINESE REVOLUTION. Judge Lebbeus R. Wilfley, formerly judge of the United States District Court at Shanghai, in a recent statement declared that Japan is deliberately fomenting the revolutionary disturbance in China in the hope of convincing the United States and the powers of Europe that Yuan Shi Kai is incapable of maintaining order and that China is in a state of anarchy, which will necessitate the taking over of Chinese sovereignty by Japan. Mr. Wilfley's opinion was answered by General Hwang Shing, one of the leaders of the Chinese Republican Party, residing in New York, who said that if Japan was back of the rebellion, she was working through President Yuan and not through the revolutionary party, which had at the beginning of the negotiations with Japan instructed all of its leaders to give Yuan the utmost support so long as he tried conscientiously to succor the nation. Dispatches of April 10 said that five Chinese warships stationed at Canton had joined the rebels on April 6 and that government troops dispatched to Canton had been recalled presumably owing to disaffection.

ARE YOU READY FOR THE TEST? This was the significant question asked by President Wilson at Washington on April 13 at the Jefferson Day banquet. He said "God forbid that we should ever become directly or indirectly embroiled in quarrels not of our own choosing," that it must only be "when the American cause coincided with that of humanity." The President might have referred either to Mexico or to the U-boat controversy, which was somewhat clarified by the German note in which it was admitted that a German submarine had torpedoed a steamship at about the time and place of the Sussex disaster, but that the German Foreign Office did not believe that it was the Sussex. In the case of four other steamers Germany stated the facts upon which her commanders had justified their action. Washington felt that the German note strengthened the American case and that proper reparation would be made if reparation were indicated by the facts as finally established. It was believed in Washington that the forthcoming American note would cover all the cases that have arisen in the controversy and will result in a final and definite agreement with Germany.

WAR LOSSES GREATLY EXAGGERATED. The old saying that "figures don't lie" has been disproved so often that we are surprised to learn from so reliable and well-informed an authority as the London Economist, that the published estimates of the loss of life in the European War have been grossly exaggerated. In its issue of March 31, 1916, the Economist says: "The total of probable dead and permanently incapacitated is appalling, but is much less than is sometimes expected or suggested, as, for instance, by one recent lecturer, who put the total destruction of life in Europe in two years of war at nearly 20,000,000 persons."

It then gives the following figures as the estimate, compiled from the best sources, of the killed, the dead from disease and the permanently incapacitated, from the opening of the war up to the end of March of the present year:

United Kingdom	235,000
France	515,000
Russia	980,000
Italy	140,000
Belgium and Serbia	130,000
Entente total	2,000,000
Germany	990,000
Austria	840,000
Turkey and Bulgaria	150,000
Turco-Teuton total	1,980,000

The Economist adds: "The population of the belligerent countries is 447,000,000 persons, and the estimate of 3,980,000 represents 0.9 per cent. of that population. The proportion is 1.7 per cent. for Austria-Hungary, 1.5 per cent. for Germany, 1.3 per cent. for France, 0.6 per cent. for Russia, and 0.5 per cent. for the United Kingdom."

Collier's Weekly, which has been wonderfully conservative in its vn estimates, comments on these fi es and says: "Obviously the concl on is that Europe has not suffered a et in such degree as the North in our vil War (not to mention the far gr er relative loss of the Confederacy), nd that even another year of war may l ve the belligerents strength enough or rapid economic revival. Talk abc a wasted and devastated Eu pe is not warranted by the facts

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

T E British in Mesopotamia have had a bad week. In continuance of his su essful operations of the week before at eladie, Sir Percy Lake, commanding th orce endeavoring to relieve Kut-el-A ra, on April 9 launched an attack in orce on the Turkish position at Sa ayyat, a mile or so to the west of Fe die and that much nearer Kut. T attack was at first successful; that is, he British penetrated the Turkish po ions; but, Turkish reinforcements co ng up, the British were driven out an back to their base at Feladie, suffer in heavy losses. The British have now be besieged in Kut for nearly four m ths, and there appears to be more th a little fear that their stores and ot r resources are nearly out.

e submarine campaign was in er singly active throughout the week. In anuary 20,000 tons of British mer ch t ships were sunk, in February 40 00, in March 100,000, and in April, up o the 14th of the month, 95,000. R rt P. Houston, member of Parliam t for Liverpool, a large ship-owner hi elf, stated in a telegraphed interv that since the beginning of the war Br sh merchant vessels representing ab t 3,000,000 tons of dead weight ca ying capacity have been lost. Mr. H ston suggests drastic remedies, such as ving the neutral states seize all the G nan merchant ships in their ports, th gh why neutrals should do so he do not suggest.

 April 7 the German secretary of foreign affairs and the Rumanian minister at Berlin signed a convention between Germany and Rumania by which both countries agree to allow free exportation to each other of home products so far as their own needs allow, except war material, and both governments allow the free transit of wares from other countries. The signing of this convention, which was not announced till the middle of last week, puts an end apparently to the probability or even the possibility of hostile action by Rumania against the Central Powers.

THE early part of the week under consideration (April 9–16) was marked by most severe fighting in the Verdun battle. The French on Saturday night evacuated the whole Bethincourt salient and fell back to a new line curving from Avocourt to Cumières. This movement brought the Germans to a position from which they could assault, with the odds in their favor, the key of the west front of Verdun, Hill No. 304. If Hill No. 304 falls into German hands and is held by them, the issue of the battle of Verdun will no longer be in doubt, though it may take some considerable time longer to carry the fight to its conclusion.

But Hill No. 304 is not yet captured, and in view of the admirably gallant and scientifically correct defense which the French have thus far put up, we may be sure that every foot of this hill will be desperately contested. Hardly had the French fallen back to new positions when the Germans made a violent attack and succeeded in entering the French trenches to the northeast of Avocourt, but were immediately thereafter expelled.

On the northern front the French reported in the Douaumont-Vaux region slight gains. A French dispatch, however, mentioned some facts hitherto unknown to us which, perhaps, are of some significance. This cable announces that three weeks ago a systematic bombardment of Rheims was begun by the Germans, and is continuing with increasing violence, over 1,000 shells falling in that town on Friday.

In all previous campaigns the Verdun and Rheims positions have been considered the strategic keys to France, and the effect of the possession of both by an invading enemy has been to force the French to fall back to the River Loire. Does this present bombardment foreshadow the approaching opening of a German offensive directed against this Rheims position? A few days will probably supply the answer to this question.

On Monday, on the western front of Verdun, the new line occupied by the French after their abandonment of the Bethincourt salient was attacked several times by the Germans, who succeeded in penetrating the French advanced positions on Hill No. 295 on a front of about 500 yards. Hill 295 lies to the northeast of Avocourt and in the triangle formed by the intersection of the road leading southeast from Malancourt with the road running west from Esnes to Avocourt, and is thus one of the approaches to the all-important strategic position, Hill No. 304. At other points this German attack was repulsed.

Tuesday, on the northern front of Verdun, the Germans made a rather spirited attack on the French trenches on the line south of Douaumont and Vaux. In addition, there was considerable artillery activity on this front, which was also true, though to a minor degree, of the east front, on which the infantry were motionless all day. On the critical front, that west of the Meuse, the Germans during the night captured several blockhouses south of the Corbeaux (Crow) wood. Bad weather toward the week's end compelled a lessening of activity on all fronts.

Peace Balloons

EVIDENTLY to find out how the wind of national opinion sets as regards the terms upon which peace may be arranged, both the German and British premiers have recently delivered very important public speeches. These have been cabled to America in part only, but from the portions given in the press it is possible to glean their purport. That by the German chancellor, Dr. von Bethmann Hollweg, in the Reichstag, April 5, was alike a defiance, a challenge and an overture. The Chancellor reviewed the course of the war thus far and found in it little but German success at arms. He dwelt on the provocation to increased effort by what he declared was the Allies' policy of starvation of Germany's population. He said:

> "I understand that in 1915 our enemies would not give up this hope (of starving out Germany), but I do not understand how cool heads, after the experiences of 1915, can cling to it. Our enemies forget that, thanks to the organizing powers of the whole nation, Germany is equal to the task of distribution of food supplies."

As to continued use of submarines, the Chancellor said:

"No fair minded neutral, no matter whether he favors us or not, can doubt our right to defend ourselves against this war of starvation, which is contrary to international law. No one can ask us to permit our arms of defense to be wrested from our hands." Seeming to touch upon possible peace conditions, he said: "Neither Germany nor Austria-Hungary intended to touch the Polish question, but the fate of battle brought us in contact with them. Now this problem stands before the world and needs to be solved. Germany and Austria-Hungary must and will solve it. History will not admit that after such earthquakes things will ever become what they were before." (And also) "After the war there must be a new Belgium. . . . We must create real guarantees that Belgium shall never be a Franco-British vassal; never shall be used as a military or economic fortification against Germany."

The Chancellor pointed out that in his speech of September 9 he had declared readiness to enter into a discussion of peace, but that then, as now, Germany's enemies declined.

"Let us suppose," said the Chancellor, "that I suggest to Mr. Asquith to sit down with me at a table and examine the possibilities of peace, and Mr. Asquith begins with a claim of definite and complete destruction of Prussia's military power. The conversation would be ended before it began. To these peace conditions only one answer would be left, and this answer our sword must give.

"If our adversaries want to continue the slaughter of human beings and the devastation, of Europe, theirs will be the guilt, and we shall have to stand it as men. Of all the nations in the war, only Germany has been threatened by her enemies and by their responsible spokesmen with annihilation, with partition of her realm, with destruction of her essential political and economic forces, no matter whether they call them Prussianism, or militarism, or barbarism.

"We did not want this war. We felt no desire to change our frontier when the war began against our will. We threatened no nation with annihilation of her existence or with destruction of her national life.

The ultimate purpose of Germany was summed up in these words:

"This new Europe in many respects cannot resemble the past. The blood which has been shed will never be repaid, and the wealth which has been destroyed can only slowly be replaced. But whatever else this Europe may be, it must be for the nations to inhabit it a land of peaceful labor. The peace which shall end this war shall be a lasting peace. It must not bear the germ of new wars, but must provide for a peaceful arrangement of European questions."

Political observers profess to see in the German Chancellor's utterances intimations of a willingness to forego territorial advantages from the war, on condition that her opportunities for trade expansion should no longer be curtailed; and that the relinquishment of conquered territory should be attended with guarantees of European peace.

It was expected that Premier Asquith would promptly reply to so plain a challenge to define the Allies' position, and on April 10, on the occasion of a formal reception to visiting French senators at which were present prominent members of the British government, he did so in a speech fully the match of the Chancellor's in confidence, defiance, rebuke and frankness. In fact, the exchange of amenities was much as though the two statesmen were discharging machine guns at each other, it being understood that some of the cartridges were blanks and if either could detect the blank ones he would find a peace prize inside. The fortunate thing about the duel is, that each is believed to be sincerely desirous of discovering the peace cartridges.

Referring to the German recapitulation of successes at arms, the Premier said: "The German Chancellor wants us to assume the attitude of a defeated to a victorious adversary. But we are not defeated. We are not going to be defeated." And as to Germany's complaint that the Allies would starve her, he said: "The Allies are prepared to justify the legality of all the measures they have taken as covered by the principles and spirit of international law applied to the developments of modern war. These have been carried out with the strictest regard to humanity, and we are not aware of a single instance of a neutral life having been lost by reason of the Allies' blockade."

The Chancellor's allusion to the fate of Poland, Belgium and other lands was replied to in the declaration: "My answer is a very simple one. The Allies desire and are determined to see once again the old Belgium. She must not be allowed to suffer permanently from the wanton, wicked invasion of her freedom, and that which has been broken down must be repaired and restored. . . . We are in this struggle the champion not only of treaty rights, but of the independent status and free development of weaker countries. In the circumstances, cynicism could hardly go further than in the Chancellor's claim that it is for Germany—of all Powers—to insist, when peace comes, upon 'giving various races a chance of free evolution along the lines of their mother tongue and national individuality.'" And the British Premier met the German Chancellor's protest against the wish to destroy Germany by declaring, "Great Britain and France entered the war not to strangle Germany or wipe her off the map of Europe, not to destroy or mutiliate her national life, certainly not to interfere with to use the Chancellor's language—the free exercise of her peaceful endeavors. As a result of the war we intend to establish the principle that international problems must be handled by free negotiations on equal terms between free peoples, and that this settlement shall no longer be hampered or swayed by the overmastering dictation of a Government controlled by a military caste. That is what I mean by the destruction of the military domination of Prussia—nothing more, nothing less."

How far toward a real getting together these speeches may lead the belligerent nations, it is not for the layman to say. The press of both countries at once seized upon the hopeful features of the incident, and began to point out to the public how much nearer an understanding England and Germany really are than might be supposed. The Nation, one of England's influential journals, said: "Europe has this week reverted to the international usage known as diplomacy. Cannon go on roaring, but statesmen have begun to talk to each other.

The Economist, another leading English organ, said: "Undoubtedly Mr. Asquith's speech has brought the possibility of a settlement near, if the German people and the German Government are, as neutral observers declare, in a mood to return to the comity of nations."

The exchange of views between the two premiers has been summed up by a trained writer and analyst, staff correspondent of the United Press, as follows:

"The end of the war has been brought appreciably nearer by significant developments of the last forty-eight hours.

"For the first time since the beginning of the war, the English premier, as Germans interpret his speech, modified his demand that Prussian militarism must be crushed. When he submitted for this the statement that German "military caste" must not in the future guide Germany's international policies, Germans believe he executed a complete backdown.

The Hollweg and Asquith statements, together with recent official and unofficial utterances, indicate peace prospects are taking shape along the lines indicated in the following sub-divisions:

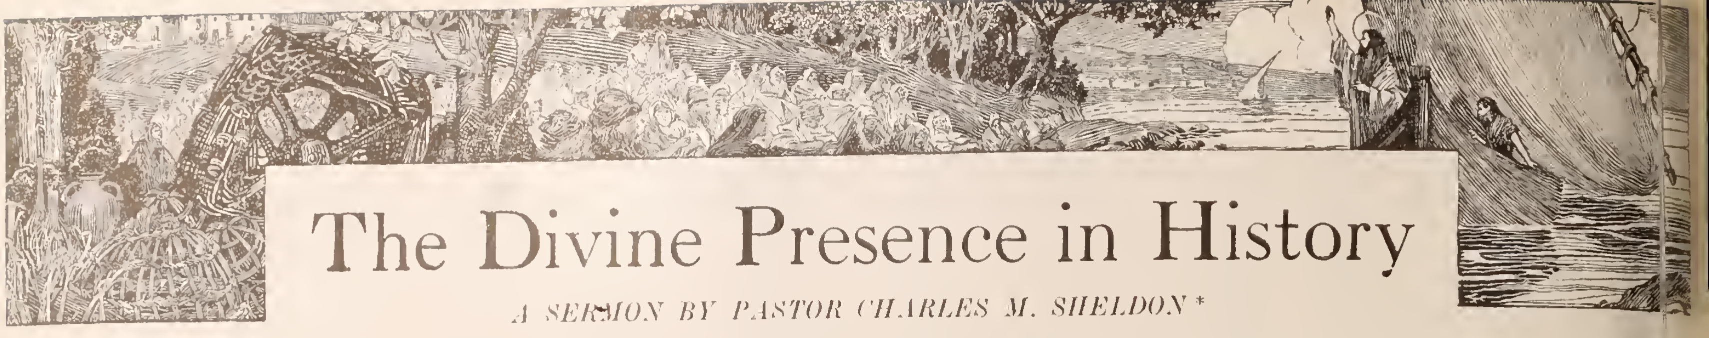
"Indemnities—Both Germany and England apparently have abandoned the idea of making the enemy pay for the war.

Belgium—The allies demand restoration and complete independence of Belgium. Germany agrees to this, provided Belgium does not discriminate against Germany after the war.

"Balkans—The central empires insist Russia shall never again dominate Balkan affairs. Bulgaria will demand Serbian Macedonia. Premier Asquith has announced that not only must Serbia be restored but she must receive territorial compensation for her sufferings.

"Alsace-Lorraine—Germany has made no recent official statement, but important suffrage concessions have been made to the provinces. In France the clamor for the restoration of Alsace-Lorraine complete apparently has subsided.

"Few persons in Berlin believe the allies will enter peace discussions until they have attempted another offensive in the west. But the most recent developments support the statement made to the United Press by a high German government official the war may end by autumn, and the recent declaration of the French minister of finance that the end of the war is in sight."



The Divine Presence in History

A SERMON BY PASTOR CHARLES M. SHELDON *

TEXT—Heb. 1:10-12. "Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundations of the earth. . . . They shall perish; but thou remainest."

GOD has always been present in history. It is because his ways are not as our ways and his thoughts are not as our thoughts that men have sometimes feared and sometimes said "there is no God any more." But of this we may be sure: God is always present and always active. We may not see his mighty arm nor hear the still small voice, but it is impossible to think of a loving Father, divine, all-powerful, intelligent, sitting off somewhere in space remote from his children, doing nothing, thinking nothing, caring nothing for them. Man has made history and left God out. Nevertheless God was there, for all history contains God, whether the human historian gives him a place in its annals or not.

And if God is with the world at all times, most certainly is he with it during its crises of history—during calamity, great financial disasters, unparalleled trouble, widespread unrest, or vast changes in affairs. God allows men to govern or try to govern themselves. He does not step in and do everything for them; but through and in all experiments of nations, God is present, and ready to help. He certainly does not banish himself from the world just when the world is most in need of his wisdom and his love.

We of this generation, compelled to acknowledge that we are in the midst of a great crisis in history, are drawn irresistibly to the serious thought that the divine presence has never been more real than now; and all the comfort, peace and inspiration that can flow out of that thought belong to the whole human race in this age of the world.

ONE of two things has generally been the result of what we call great crises in history. Men have either felt God's presence in wonderful power, or they have denied him altogether. They have either turned to him as the only refuge left, or they have turned away from him and gone their ways alone. That was what France did after the Revolution. America, under her Revolution, kept alive a warm spirit of devotion and religious belief. During the great flood at Johnstown, Pennsylvania, it was related that several persons, who had lost all their property and all their children in that disaster, took their Bibles and tore them in pieces, renouncing forever their faith in a loving God, while others, just as deeply afflicted, turned again to Him with renewed faith and a love that has since blessed the world with kindly deeds. Out of loss, affliction, sorrow, accident, plague, disaster, war, there come to some a clearer knowledge of the divine, and sweeter, deeper life experience; for others come bitterness, disbelief, hardness.

But if men and nations have an abiding knowledge of the continual presence of the Divine in world events, the rising tides of history only lift them nearer God. That is what we want to pray and work for in this age—that our nation, that the world may turn to God as the greatest, most real, most important, most needful of all facts today. No one denies that we are in need of him. No one denies that we are facing a crisis in the history of man. There is also a crisis in the affairs of the church, according to some of the most thoughtful of our religious leaders. Over the the globe runs the tremor of coming mighty events. At such a time and with such history-making, nothing can be of so much lasting power and blessing to us as individuals, and as a country, as to turn with all our hearts and minds to the divine presence in history, an abiding principle, a fixed and unalterable fact, as much a reality as gravitation, as hopeful as the shining of the sun, as quieting to men's passions as the brooding Spirit of the Creation over the heaving waters of the first tumultuous tempest of the earth

What is the result of a life lived with God? I think the first result to an individual or a nation is Peace. This does not mean laziness, indifference, cowardice, lack of responsibility, or overconfidence. This is what it means: Suppose you are a soldier. There is going to be a battle. There is a probability that in that battle you may be killed. You are in the side that has a just cause. You are going to fight for liberty, home, truth, right. Your commander is one whom you can and do most completely trust. You know that even if he is beaten in this battle and you are killed, yet in the end he will conquer and the right will triumph. You can march into that battle with peace in your soul. You are not indifferent, nor cowardly, nor overconfident; you fight as if the whole result depended on you; yet you are at peace in your soul.

If there is anything the world needs today it is the peace of God. Unrest, dissatisfaction, discontent, these tear at the heart of the world today. A feverish unrest boils over our splendid civilization. Its demands grow more exacting on brain and heart and home. The world must turn to God soon, or it will go mad through its nervous lack of spiritual repose. We need an equipoise, a steadier of life, a leaning back on something with "eternal" written on its forehead.

ANOTHER result of a life lived with God is Hope. The nation that lives with God has always the hopeful spirit that looks on the strongest and best in its own history. It gives a man or a nation a wonderful uplift to feel that God is near. The man who believes in God believes in all good things, and is ready to help all good things. The man who has little faith has little work. We go to the Divine in a crisis of life and we say, "Lord, it seems pretty dark and gloomy, but our souls repose on thee as the hope of the world." And, once close by his side, we seem to hear him say: "There is a good deal of cheer yet." That is what God is saying to the world today when it turns an ear to hear. "Behold the praying mothers and fathers of the world. Behold the consecrated intelligence of your college and university youth growing up to take responsible places as statesmen. Behold the churches that are not all given over to display and architecture and formality, doing Christ's work in the slum and on the frontier. Behold an age which, in spite of its materialism, still is not an age of infidel thought, but rather of honest search for truth. Behold a vast array of goodness permeating society and forbidding much evil that once was tolerated." That is the way the Divine breathes hope into the human when the man turns to him for help. Hope!

Another result of living with God is Wisdom. "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him." James 1:5. Does that not include the statesmen and congressmen of today? Who says that in this nation any one man is wise enough to devise just exactly the best measures for the good of the whole country? If ever a nation needed help from God to direct its affairs, ours needs that help. There is a perfect chaos of reasons and remedies for our national ills. And every man is sure that he is right and all the rest are wrong. Do we not need wisdom from a Divine source? And is not the promise exact and positive, "If any of you"—that means all men—"lack wisdom"—that certainly means our nation—"let him ask of God"—not of human statesmen or human opinion, but of God—"who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not." He will not refuse us even though we ask foolishly if we ask sincerely—"and it (wisdom) shall be given him." What more could we ask? Certainly the "wisdom" referred to does not mean simply spiritual or religious knowledge of God. It means what wisdom always means in the Bible, applied knowledge. It is positively sure that if this nation lived with God and sincerely asked for wisdom to direct its affairs, such wisdom would be granted.

Another result of living with God in times of need is the courage which comes to us from the knowledge that we are co-workers with God in building up his kingdom. This gives us a nobler thought of ourselves and furnishes us with needed inspiration and enthusiasm. As Paul says, "we are laborers together with God." That is what makes life worth anything after all. Suppose we were allowed to fall back on our weakness and our human limitations. God says, "You poor weak man, you need not put yourself to any trouble to help make things any better. I will do it all. I am omnipotent. You may please yourself while I do it. I made the world and it is my affair to make it right, now that it is going wrong." What a poor contemptible creature man would be, shunning all responsibility, knowing nothing of self-denial, living to himself alone, destitute of the strength which comes from struggle, ignorant of the joy which springs from victory! And on the other hand, suppose God said to us, "The whole affair of fighting sin and bringing in the reign of peace is yours. You need not look to me for help. You brought your own evils on yourself by your disobedience. It is your duty now to extricate yourselves, all alone." What then had been the bitter burden mankind had carried, as it toiled painfully over the road of life? But no! The Divine and the human go together through this world! That is the blessed consolation of life! God says, "Son, daughter, take my hand. Rest you burden on my strength. Fight, but feel me near, re y to help. It is your own battle and I will fight i with you." Truly is it said: "One with God is a majo y."

OH that the nation might turn heart and m l to Him now and feel his presence near; fee onscions of his fellowship with the race; know, and how deep, deep down in the real life, that the na nal life must be lived with God! It means a grea leal that the Divine works for us. It means a grea leal more that he works with us. There is a sweetn s in fellowship which is not found in allowing some e to give or do outside of our sharing with it. Sh ng! That is a divine thing. The thought that God ares my joys, griefs, ambitions, hopes, desires, aspira ons enthusiasms, is a thought so great that someti s it seems almost as if it could not be true. And t I am assured again and again that it is true and e is Immanuel, God with us. He understands us.

The time will come when the Lord of all the rth shall bring to an end the present material ler. The history of humanity shall all be acted out. The play shall come to an end. The actors shall all ish from earth's stage. The last tragedy shall b performed. The last tear shall be shed, the last igh breathed on earth. And God shall say "eno h!" Then, like a vesture, shall he fold up all these t ngs and they shall be changed. Stupendous ch ge! It says they shall "perish." They shall not as they now are. They shall be changed.

When that change takes place, what will rema of all that is worth anything? God will remain the same as ever, for his years shall not fail. From erlasting to everlasting he is God. The shoc of terrible events in man's history affect him like a Fa er, but have no effect on his eternity. God shall re ain unchanged, eternal Love, eternal Fatherhood, et nal Light, eternal Life.

Whatever is divine in man shall also remain ith God. Physical sense and fleshly tastes shall n remain. They shall perish. Only the divine, a we call it and as it is, shall be possible when the rth and heaven are passed away. Character, love he results of self-denial and purity and truth and s ice—these shall remain when all else is swept ay, perished, changed. God will not inhabit ete ity alone. With him forever shall exist the spirits he just made perfect, the martyrs who gave their es for his name's sake, the little children who for ges have gone out of this world into his presence, a he souls that have washed their robes and made em white in the blood of the Lamb.

WHAT, then, can be better for us as indivi als and as a nation, than to turn to God and ve and move in him? Are we perplexed, annoyed isheartened, terrified, fearful of the future? God has not departed out of our lives, nor out of huma istory. He is a Father, and a Father loves his chil en. He is a Saviour, and he will care for his own. ere is no crisis so serious, no calamity so terrible, n experience in human life so unusual, that the D ne is unable to face with tranquillity and easy p er. What has our nation to fear now, or any time, it will accept the help of God?

What we need most of all, therefore, is the po ng out of the Holy Spirit of God upon our nation, at it may, in the light of revealing truth, turn unto he Almighty and ask forgiveness for its sins and to d his will. What the nation needs is a powerful co iction of its need of God. Congress needs it. he business men of the country need it. The col es and schools need it. The churches need it. he entire structure of society needs the purifying, plifting, redeeming, regenerating incoming of the od who laid the foundations of the earth, whose pres ce in human history is an eternal fact, whose pow to help has been witnessed at many turning-poin in the lives of men and nations.

Let us prepare our hearts for the indwelling o he Spirit of God. Let us spend much time in pr er, that the baptism of another Pentecost may res n the world in this age, as when it ushered in he triumph of the cross over the pagan. Let us turn to the Lord and he will have mercy upon us, and to ur God, and he will abundantly pardon. God ll bless us, and all the ends of the earth shall fear n. For this God is our God. He will be our guide en unto death. May the Holy Spirit bless with p er the preaching of the truth. Amen.

The Hall-Mark of True Courage

SUNDAY, April 30. Acts 5:41-42. "They departed; . . . rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer . . . and ceased not to teach and preach Jesus Christ." That is a courage which I think bears the hall-mark of supreme worth: to suffer for cause, and then to quietly return and renew one's work in the very place of suffering. It is the courage which goes from the hospital back to the field. Such heroes know all that it means—for have they not suffered?—but they go back in the strength of quietness and in the solemn inspiration of patriotic devotion. The stricken nurse returns to the field where her strength had leaked away, and her courage also bears the royal seal.

There are other sorts of warfare and other sorts of wounds. Spirits can be wounded. Our spirits can be more bruised in our discharge of a Christian mission. We can be wounded by indifference. We can be wounded by ingratitude. We can be wounded by an openly avowed contempt. There are painful wounds in the hearts of consecrated laborers, who rare if ever have the joy of carrying sheaves into the garner. And these bruised spirits take their wounds to the Saviour every night, and in the morning they go back again to the trench. Their wounds do not make them cowards. They do not desert their mission because it hurts. When James Gilmour had abode in Mongolia some years he wrote these words in his journal: "In the shape of converts I have seen no result. I have not, as far as I am aware, seen any one who even wanted to be a Christian!" But the grand hero went back to his trench, and in the long run ed upon the field.

When we allow our wounds to impair our devotion, we inflict more terrible wounds upon the Lord. We may turn to our ease, but it is at the cost of crucifying our Lord afresh. We retire into our tent, but we have put him on the cross. But when we are wounded, and yet go back to our field, saying nothing about our wounds to anybody, then do we glorify the Lord anew, and own him Lord of all. J. H. J.

The Wonder of the Divine Nature

MONDAY, May 1. Isa. 66:1-12. The prophet dwells on the wonder that he whose throne is in heaven should stoop to look on the man who is of a poor and contrite spirit, and who trembleth at his word. A very eloquent preacher reminds us that the infinite spaces of the sky and the glory of them can be gathered up in a moment of time within the tiny pupil of a human eye. Thus the shepherd, stretched upon the ground, is amazed at the wonders of the canopy above him. "Side by side, and all at once, yet never twisted or confused, these ten thousand rays of different light enter the little aperture in the center of the eye which we call the pupil, and on the curtain of the eye they paint the inverted facsimile of the heavens." How wonderful it is that a slender filament of light, entering so small an aperture, and striking on a tiny patch of nervous network, should be able to reproduce a whole skyful of suns and worlds.

In this way we may help ourselves to understand how He whose presence pervades the universe, whose glory is in the skies, who fills immensity as the ocean's waters fill its bed—"the High and Holy One who inhabiteth eternity"—can enter into some poor, crushed, and broken spirit that trembles at the least whisper of his voice. This is the wonder of the divine nature! God is so great that the heavens cannot contain him, but he limits himself to our poor capacity. Thus once he stooped to the tiny baby form that Mary cradled in her arms. How rich that presence makes the poor! How brave the heart is which trembles before none but God! F. B. M.

Prayer and Its Results

TUESDAY, May 2. Heb. 4:16. "That we may receive mercy and find grace to help in time of need." One great thing has resulted from these war days the renewed dependence upon prayer. Think of the multitude of fathers' and of mothers' prayers that rise above the tragic battlefields of Europe daily, or ascend like hovering angels above the trenches or over the battleships. You say, "How few of these prayers can be answered! How many of these heroic sons will fail to return to their loved ones and are already lying in unmarked graves on distant battlefields!" For this reason has prayer been vain?

What is prayer? Prayer is the converse of the soul with God. It is more than petition with some specific request in mind; it is an atmosphere of the soul. It is an attitude of the spirit relating itself harmoniously to the divine plan, and eager to act according to the mind and will of God.

Prayer induces the mood wherein decisions, vows, and renunciations occur and with their accomplishment bring a new vigor to the human soul. It is at the time of prayer that we become thankful to Him whose power and goodness watch round about us continually.

Prayer is the time of vision. It is the seeing of the Christ face to face, as Paul saw him and never forgot, saying, "Have I not seen Jesus Christ?"

A ship was lost in the fog, drifting about for days, and the passengers and crew were becoming frightened and some hopeless. Suddenly the captain said to a sailor, "Climb to the masthead, and tell us what you see." As the sailor climbed he arose above the fog and the shore lay smiling only a few miles in the distance. He came back with radiant face and told his vision. The great result of prayer is the vision of love and home in God, seen by him who rises in his need above the mists and darkness. C. S. C.

The Glorious Priesthood of Jesus

WEDNESDAY, May 3. Ex. 28:1-12, and Heb. 5:1-9. Every race that has been conscious of God's greatness and holiness has selected one of its number to act as priest. This is specially noticeable in the remarkable story of Micah, in the book of Judges. The system of priestly service was a special feature of the Mosaic legislation; but the Aaronic priesthood was but a feeble type of the glorious priesthood of our Lord, which is the special theme of the Epistle to the Hebrews. The priests of Aaron's line were compassed with infirmity; but he is the Son, perfected for evermore. They had to offer sacrifices for themselves; but he, having been made perfect, became the Author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him. They stood in daily service, because their work was never finished; but he, when he had offered one sacrifice for sins forever, sat down at the right hand of God. They indeed were made priests without an oath; but he with an oath, by him that sware by himself, "Thou art a Priest forever." They were made priests many in number, because that by death they were hindered from continuing; but he, because he abides forever, has an unchangeable priesthood, that does not pass to another. The Aaronic priesthood was changed because it belonged to the order of this world; but Christ, having come as a High Priest of the good things that were to come, through the greater and more perfect Tabernacle, not of this creation nor yet through the blood of goats and calves, but through his own blood, entered in once for all into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption. Let us make much of the priesthood of our Lord! F. B. M.

The Sense of the Protecting Presence

THURSDAY, May 4. Ex. 23:20. "Behold, I send an Angel before thee, to keep thee in the way, and to bring thee into the place which I have prepared." God does not change in his mode of helpfulness to his children. Read the above words spoken to his people thousands of years ago and then remember how the promise has been fulfilled again and again throughout the generations of men. Today the promise belongs to me. Today it belongs to you.

Tomorrow has nothing to affright the man or woman who accepts these words as true. Each morning becomes a new opportunity to go forth expectantly to follow the angel who walks ahead to prepare the way. The path may not always be smooth; it may lead at times through shadows as black as death. Even the dark tunnel does not frighten the child who can cling tightly to his father's arm.

In a great steamship disaster, a father was seen carrying a sleeping six-year-old child in his arms to a life-boat. The boy was awakened by the commotion and fear about him. He opened his eyes to look up into his father's face, and then he snuggled a bit more closely into his parent's arms and closed his eyes again in sleep. He was interested only to know that he was in the protecting embrace of his father; that was the one all-important fact for him.

In the storms of life it is not the sound of the waves that matters; it is the sense of the enfolding arms of God about us that makes for peace. The smallest obstacles are huge to him who does not know that One goes ahead to prepare the way, while the mountains reveal pathways to him who believes and acts upon the promise of this text. Let me think today of the angel that goes ahead. C. S. C.

The Mediatorship of Jesus

FRIDAY, May 5. Ex. 24:12-18; Deut. 18:15-19; and Heb. 8:6. "A Prophet like unto Moses" can only refer to our Lord. As Israel stood to hear the words of God's law, amid the terrible accompaniment of thunder, lightning, and earthquake, they were filled with a great fear. They felt the need of some one to act as daysman, mediator, interpreter—one of a thousand to come between them and God. Even the elders, the most spiritual among them, who understood God better than the rest, could not bear the terror of that voice. So with us: we should not be able to bear the unveiled glory of God on our poor human nature, save that it shines in the face of the Man Christ Jesus, who is the brightness of his glory and the express image of his person; but because the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same. "One Mediator between God and men, the Man Christ Jesus!"

Moses came in God's name to free Israel from Pharaoh's bondage, and he did it: Jesus came to set us free from a worse bondage still, and he has achieved our freedom. Moses led the people through the Red Sea: Jesus has led us through the depths of the grave into the new world of resurrection and ascension. Moses conducted the march through the wilderness; Jesus goes before his own sheep, when he leads them out. Moses led to the rest of Canaan; Jesus to that Sabbath-keeping which remaineth for the people of God. Moses spake to the people for God, and to God for the people; and Jesus ever liveth to make intercession. Moses proposed to die for Israel; but Jesus did actually die for our redemption. Moses "was not," because God, by his kiss, took him to himself from Pisgah; and Jesus ascended from Olivet. "See that ye refuse not him that speaketh!" F. B. M.

The Heart's Sacred Places

SATURDAY, May 6. Gen. 28:16. "Surely the Lord is in this place." There is a beautiful legend about Zaccheus, who, while he was sitting on a branch of a sycamore tree, first spied Jesus. It is said that Zaccheus in his old age used to go every morning to the tree where he first saw the Lord. He would pour water upon its roots, pull up the weeds he found growing there and look up long and lovingly at the branches where he had sat on that blessed day when he first saw Jesus.

Are not all places sacred where troubled hearts first saw the Lord? Memory sweetly recalls the day and spot, though we may be unable to visit the scene. Every church is sacred where souls have found Christ in the midst. It is to them the very house of God and the gate of heaven, for they realize "the Lord is in this place," for "this and that man was born here."

Every place of worship should be dear to us, for it is where the army of the Lord gathers to make "prisoners of hope" of rebels against the kingdom of God. Rev. J. R. Miller says: "Should we not do for the church what Zaccheus did for his tree? Visit it often, daily water its roots by prayers, toils and tears; keep the weeds away, so far as your own life is concerned, and make it a place of blessing to many more."

"Are Ye Able?"

"Are ye able to drink of the cup that I drink?"

HIS cousins had asked to sit on his right and left "in his kingdom."

How his soul thrilled as quietly, earnestly, without vaunting and without shrinking, they answered, "We are able."

For over sixty years St. John drank the cup of reproach and suffering. St. James, perhaps more fortunate, was the first of the twelve to die for the faith.

St. Paul pressed on toward "the Prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." He knew the path, "the fellowship of His sufferings, becoming conformed unto His death."

Would you be great in the kingdom to God? Still abides the challenge of the Christ:

Apropos of the Above

THAT is a beautiful song. The music is excellent, the words stirring. But isn't there a note left out, both in the music and in the words? We do not say that this missing note should really have appeared in this hymn of service to our risen Lord, but it would not have been out of place. It is the note of practical relief to the crushed and discouraged of earth's unfortunates. We are thinking of the widows and orphans of the war in Europe.

There is accumulating in the Christian Herald office a list of names of givers to this fund which space thus far has not permitted us to publish, though every contribution will be acknowledged in this paper. We publish as many of these names as is practicable in the present issue, and hope to find space for most of the names within a short time. Yet how insignificant, after all, is the matter of publication of these names in comparison with the fact of the gifts themselves and what they mean to these untellably miserable fellow beings in Europe!

Untellable is the right word to use, and yet men and women who have witnessed the actual conditions that prevail cannot refrain from trying to tell the American public what those conditions really are. It should be enough to every generous heart to know that the need is absolute. The coming of spring does not of necessity lessen the need, though it changes somewhat the conditions. Starvation is starvation, homelessness is just that, and helplessness is helplessness whether the winds blow cold or warm. And heartaches and body aches, too, are just as entitled to Christian sympathy in May as in December.

We again urge this vast need upon the consideration of our readers. Many are undertaking to make stated contributions regularly, and we think this is a most commendable plan. But the inability to give twice certainly should not deter any from giving once. Share your blessings be they great or small, be they frequent or scarce, share them with these who are living today upon the crumbs from the world's table. We ask you to enable us to make large remittances to all our committees now actively at work in every devasted land across the ocean. The Christian Herald Family has done nobly, as it always does in such times. Now if ever let us not become weary in well doing.

Please address contributions to the Widows and Orphans Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

SUNKIST LEMONS

Friend Farmer

FOR a number of years there has been a more or less continuous raising of the question as to who gets the money that is represented by the difference between the price paid by the consumer for farm products and the price received by the farmer for those same products. There has been a feeling that there was something wrong somewhere with the system under which these products were marketed, and since between the farmer and his ultimate customer a number of men must handle the goods, these middle men have received a large share of the blame for the discrepancy between the prices paid by the consumer and those realized by the producer.

The American farmer is the greatest individualist in the world. It has been his proud boast through countless generations that he is his own boss, and that he takes orders from no one. And many a man who does not know the farmer's problems has envied the farmer his liberty of action, his broad acres, and his outdoor life. When the country was young, neighborhoods were more or less independent in raising and producing practically all the things which they needed. There were even individual farmers who produced everything they needed for eating or wearing, and what little surplus they had was sold by the farmers themselves at neighboring villages. As the country grew and its civilization developed, there was marked tendency on the part of different sections to produce only the crops best suited to their soil and climates, and with this tendency came the problem of distribution.

To a large degree this specialization was due to the development of the railways which furnished transportation from field to market. This transportation service costs money, and the cost of carrying a product from the place of its origin to the place of its ultimate sale is the beginning of the difference between the producer's and the consumer's prices. When commodities began to be shipped in quantities it became necessary for someone to supervise the shipping; the result was the local buyer in the town nearest the farm from which the product starts on its course.

The farmer is usually a cash seller. There is a market price for his product and he frequently sells only when he needs money, and it is necessary for someone then to finance the shipment. This man is the local buyer. He takes the butter and the eggs, the corn, the wheat or the cotton at the prevailing price for the day in the nearest wholesale market, first deducting a commission to cover his risks, his cost of doing business, and his profit, which is his wage for service rendered. The farmer gets what is left of the wholesaler's payment to the local buyer and for the moment disappears from this story.

The next step is the transportation which lays the product down in the wholesale market in the hands of the receiving elevator if it is grain, or in the hands of a broker or commission merchant if it is produce. Then there is a regular process through the hands of wholesaler, jobber and retailer, with charges for drayage, for packing, expenses of handling and profits for the principals in each transaction. At each stage of the process the product has been getting one step nearer (and dearer) to the consumer, and when the consumer finally takes it to his home he is paying his share (and perhaps a little more) of the cost of getting the goods from the far fields, where it was grown, to the counter upon which he found it.

THE consumer has chafed under the high prices of his food. He has specified every man in the series from the farmer up as in some degree a highwayman, and at times he has been serious enough in his objection to refuse to buy, in which case the prices drop all along the line. The farmer going to market with his goods has found the price a mere equivalent for the effort of producing the goods and the farmer has expressed his opinion of the series of middle men in no uncertain terms. But for a good many years no serious effort was made to eliminate the possibly useless processes or even to find out what they were.

In the early 70's of the last century, the Grange movement sprang up in America and spread over a considerable proportion of the rural districts. The Grange movement did at least one thing for the farmer: it made the first breach in the wall of his individualism. It got him into conference with his fellow farmers and helped him to see that his troubles were also the troubles of his neighbors, and that by mutual action something might be done to insure him a more certain market and a larger share of the market value of his products. Cooperative associations of various kinds began to develop, especially in the middle west. Since this is a grain-producing country, a great majority of these associations organized to conduct their own elevators, to receive their own grain, and to sell it in primary markets. This movement began to be marked in 1890, and it is estimated that the farmers' elevators in Minnesota are the means of saving the farmers of the state from one to three cents per bushel for grain, approximately a million dollars a year. There are now in the United States more then 2000 farmers' elevators; these farmer companies pay the market price for grain and return dividends to their members and patrons on the basis of the total amount of business done by the member with the organization, stock holdings being kept down to a minimum.

WITH the gradual increase of the number of milch cows upon the farms and the invention of the separator, the production of cream became more and more a profit industry, and cream buyers appeared at every station of the railroads. This individualistic system of doing business also showed an element of waste and now there are approximately 2165 cooperative creameries in the United States and 336 cooperative cheese factories.

An illustration of the value of cooperation by cream raisers is found in the fight by the farmers of Wisconsin with the cheese boards through whom they had been selling their cream. In 1912 the situation became so acute and the farmers so thoroughly aroused that they met in the middle of haying time to organize a cooperative movement. As a result, the Federated Farmers' Warehouse Company was organized, and a modern up-to-date warehouse and cold storage plant was erected from which was marketed the cheese from 44 factories operating under the cooperative plan. In spite of the refusal of the Sheboygan Cheese Board to permit the cooperatively produced article to be sold on their floor, and the penalizing of those members who accepted cheese from the federated factories, the federation succeeded and is now handling as much as a million pounds of cheese a month, and the service of the cooperating companies is costing the farmers just one-fifth of what they were formerly paying to the local cheese buyer.

The California Fruit Growers' Exchange is another example of the value of cooperation. This exchange handles all the citrus fruits of southern California with branches in all the principal cities, and a thoroughly organized distribution system. They have developed new markets and have arranged for a steady supply to all markets, so that the producer is receiving a higher average price throughout the year than could have been possible without the organization, and the consumer is receiving better goods in better condition and at a somewhat lower price than was paid a few years ago, before the trade was thoroughly organized.

In the south, cotton growers have their own ginning and marketing organizations, and in a number of places the farmers have even gone so far as to organize cooperative stores through which to make their purchases of those things which they cannot raise. The farmer is beginning to find out how he can shorten the distance between himself and the primary markets, but the consumer is still paying the cost of operation of the more or less unwieldy machinery that carries the goods from the primary markets to the retail counter.

VARIOUS attempts on the part of individual farmers and farmers' cooperative associations to sell direct to the consumer have proven unsatisfactory, largely because the average consumer can buy only in such small quantities that transportation cost becomes an insurmountable barrier. Butter, eggs, poultry and some fruits are, however, being handled through the parcel post and by express directly from the producer to the consumer, the post office or the express company being the only middle man. The great bulk of the products of the farm, however, must be sold through the channels of trade. If they are consigned to a receiving house in a large market, the cost of selling may reach as high as ten per cent., because the receiving house must send salesmen to search for possible buyers and it is not possible for any house, no matter how large, to offer any consignment of goods to all of the persons who might be interested in it. Perishable goods frequently fail to sell before they have become unsalable, and thus become a total loss.

In recent years in seventeen American cities, auction sales have been developed for perishable merchandise. At these auctions (the auction room becomes the primary market), buyers of every degree, wholesalers, retailers, hotels, large consumers and even peddlers are on hand ready to bid for the merchandise they need. Samples of merchandise offered are shown and the buyers bid on the lots represented by the samples. It has been found that merchandise can be marketed through the auction at a less cost than through the slower methods of the ordinary trade, and a very large percentage of the fruit of the country, especially the citrus fruits of California and Florida and imported fruits, are now being marketed through the auctions, the cost of selling being from two to five per cent., thus yielding a slightly higher price to the producer without affecting in any way the cost to the consumer.

It is essential that merchandise to be sold at auction should be uniformly packed so that samples will properly represent the merchandise. It is equally essential for successful marketing through the auction that the supply should be reasonably steady. Attempts to handle farm produce through the auction companies have failed largely through failure of the farmers to pack their goods attractively and honestly, and also because of intermittent shipments, which leave the auction frequently without merchandise for which buyers are seeking, thus discouraging buyers from attending. Auction sales are considered, however, as offering a partial solution to the problem of how to secure for the producer a larger percentage of the price paid by the consumer. Cooperative organizations, by arranging to hold their products, to grade them, and to deliver them in the different auction markets regularly and in attractive and standardized packages, will find it possible to increase the returns to their members from five to ten per cent.

It is probably impossible to make any arrangement whereby the farmers' cooperative organizations can deal directly with the retailer, for the reason that the retailer as a class requires credit, and sometimes long credit, and also needs to buy small quantities and to buy often. An alternative to the wholesaler would be an organization acting as distributing agent for a group of cooperative producing associations, yet this would be practically the wholesaler again and would require the entrance of the farmers' organizations into a field of merchandising foreign to their natural business.

There is one other alternative, and that is cooperative organizations among the consumers, and these have in some places succeeded in meeting the farmers' organizations, marketing and distributing the products of the farm to their members at a saving in cost over purchases at the ordinary retail prices. The consumer is, however, a very unstable quantity. While he is no doubt willing to profit by any savings that may be effected in the scheme of distribution, it is almost too much to hope that he will ever be a serious factor in producing these savings. Thorough investigation has indicated that the margin of difference between the price paid by the consumer and the price realized by the producer is very largly accounted for by cost of services which cannot be dispensed with.

[This question is one that concerns all of our readers, whether they produce food stuffs or buy their supplies. The Christian Herald will welcome information as to concrete cases in which the question has been solved in whole or in part. Have you had experience that will help someone else?]

Ministerial Fitness

WILL belief in the Bible by and by cease to be a test of the fitness of a candidate for appointment to the Christian ministry? The question is timely in view of the recent course of some denominations in the examination of seminary graduates. What is now known as "the enlightened school of religious thought" had its innings a few days ago, when the New York Presbytery accepted three candidates of Union Theological Seminary who declined to affirm their faith in the divine birth and the resurrection, two of the time-honored tests of ministerial fitness. They were in a dubious state of mind also concerning the miracles recorded in the Old Testament, especially drawing the line at the pillar of fire which guided the Israelites in their journeyings, the manna in the wilderness, and the story of Jonah. There was a sharp tilt in presbytery between the representatives of the old and the new school theologies, and the conservatives deplored the drift toward heresy, but without avail. The new school took the bit in its teeth and came out of the fight victorious.

Such doings naturally excite surprise among Christian people. If there is a standard of faith for the ministry, it should either be adhered to honorably, or altered, or abolished altogether. The test of fitness for the Christian ministry should deal with the vital principles of Christianity only and with nothing else; but it is of the first importance that these principles should be upheld. There is a vast amount of irreverent and wholly superfluous criticism of the Bible. And when the old Book is flouted by those who stand pledged to defend it, those who have believed in the divine mission of the church and in its fidelity to the orthodox standards of the faith find their confidence in man's wisdom sadly shaken.

Moody used to tell the story of a preacher of "the enlightened school" who, in his sermons, disparaged the integrity of the Bible to such an extent that one of the members, after tearing out book by book as they were assailed, came at last to the pastor with the empty covers. Nothing else had been left of the Bible. It would seem that some of the theological seminaries are training men who, as pastors, will accomplish pretty much the same results as did the preacher in Mr. Moody's striking anecdote.

But these are simply episodes, similar to the assaults that have been flung against the Bible again and again. They come and go, but the old Book throws them aside, as the rock tosses off the dashing waves. The Bible will survive all of its critics.

Campaign Surprises

IT is beginning to dawn on the party politicians that there is a likelihood of lively surprises in the approaching presidential campaign. They are not at all certain as to the shape things may assume before the nominating conventions meet. That there will be a sharp struggle over the Republican nomination is regarded as certain. "Dark horses" may loom up later, but at the present moment the Republican stage holds only two distinguished rivals—Judge Hughes and the Colonel from Oyster Bay. There is a wide difference between these two, however. The judge is silent and noncommittal; the colonel voluble and emphatic, announcing in plain terms that if the convention should nominate him it must not expect him to "pussyfoot" on any single issue which he has raised. In view of the fact that Mr. Roosevelt has been at times a pronounced neutral regarding the European War, and at other times a vehement advocate of the Allies; that he has declared that we have "not the smallest responsibility for what has befallen Belgium," and, months later, has taken the stand that we had "ignobly shirked" our duty in refusing to protest against the Belgian invasion—in view of these and several other unfortunate inconsistencies, it is difficult to see how he can possibly avoid "pussyfooting" automatically, unless, indeed, he is so skilful a political acrobat that he can stand on both sides of a plank at once. Elihu Root, who has been acclaimed "the ablest son of his party," stands dimly immovable in the background. On the Democratic side, Mr. Wilson, too, will have to sidestep some slippery places that do not afford reliable ground for a foothold. These and various other considerations are causing the party leaders to wonder what is going to happen when the conventions meet.

There is another possibility which may arise to bother them. The country, as a whole, wants peace, in spite of the "preparedness" fluster. At the great peace meeting at Carnegie Hall lately, Rabbi Wise, one of the most eloquent speakers, paid a wonderfully impressive tribute to the man whose name, he declared, would go down in history as the leader in the expedition which had crossed the seas in a brave effort to restore peace to the world. He believed that the name of this peace argonaut would be written large in imperishable characters, while other contemporary names are forgotten. It is quite within the range of possibilities that the millions of Americans who sincerely desire a peace-loving President might conclude that the opportunity had come to place such a man as Henry Ford at the head of a "People's Party" ticket, which would draw strength from all other parties and would include Independents, Socialists, and a considerable proportion of those who are dissatisfied with the old organizations. Not only is this conceivable, but it might even assume such proportions that it would easily hold the balance of power in a national campaign. The recent demonstration of Mr. Ford's strength in Michigan, and the undoubted following he would have in the Middle West and probably elsewhere, must be viewed as placing him among the list of possibilities.

The Christian Herald is not a political paper in any sense, but its readers have a special interest in the great moral questions involved in the approaching campaign, which have a direct bearing upon the future welfare of the nation. It would not surprise us if the politicians, who are just now bothering over many things, might have a new sensation before the year is much older.

This Bill Should Not Pass

THIS is just the time when a measure like the Burnett Bill, now under consideration by the United States Senate, should not pass. This bill applies the literacy test to all immigrants, and is the counterpart of a bill passed last year by Congress but vetoed by the President. It is to be hoped that if the present bill gets through the Senate the President will again exercise his right of veto.

The American Federation of Labor has acted most unwisely in supporting this bill. Some labor organizations are, however, opposed to it, and their counsel should prevail. The cause of labor is world-wide. The better day for which labor is looking will never dawn until the laborers of the world learn to act in concert. If the present war has taught one thing more than another, it is that the laborers should have this international spirit and viewpoint, rather than the narrow spirit of nationalism.

The literacy test does not provide the means for separating the worthy from the unworthy. For America to shut her doors to the harassed, troubled, sorrow-stricken laborers of Europe when this war is over would be an iniquitous, unbrotherly, shortsighted act.

The Spring Gladness

A WOMAN subscriber wrote to us the other day, saying: "I have often wondered how some of our most devoted Christian people have formed the custom of associating the most sacred season of the whole year with hats and bunnies, etc. Just stop and watch a flower-bedecked crowd floating down some flower-decked aisle; just stop and glance at the attractively arranged show-windows of any shop, see the sign hanging in front of the bakery—'hot cross buns today'! Are there any emblems of Christian people? I can't see any."

It is springtime. All over the land buds are coming out upon the trees, grass is springing up in the meadows, and the violets and arbutus blossoms are growing under the dead leaves of last autumn. Perhaps there are crocuses blooming on your lawn and tulips sprouting in your garden bed.

It is springtime. The whole earth is doing its very best to be beautiful in honor of the season. The birds themselves are wearing their most brilliant plumage and singing their happiest songs. Isn't it just human nature for shopkeepers to decorate their windows in pretty colors, and for women to want new hats? If God had not wanted the world to be bright and beautiful, he could have made the flowers brown and the grass brown and the sunshine gray.

Of course, some people carry the love of color and new clothes too far. Charmed by mere surface beauty, they forget there should be a spiritual beauty, and they yield themselves to vanity and the charm of the passing show. But these are extremists, whose methods or ideals cannot be admired by evenly balanced folk, and—there are extremists in everything. But we do say frankly, and we believe what we say, that there are very few women who do not get joy and happiness out of a new hat. And as the keynote of springtime is joy and happiness, surely all such things, in moderation, have their place in the season after all.

Shall These Babies Live or Di

"MILK I received last week one quart. A l yet Peterchen is very weak and should hav ome milk every day. I fear things wil grow worse rather than better, but we will not co lain, for everything must turn out for the best. ortunately we have enough work."

"Dear little Johanna has grown very thin ce I was forced to stop nursing him because I have n more food for him. Malchen also is barely more n a shadow of herself, and in the highest degree a mic. She is always sick. How could she be well w the food we are giving her? She ought to have muc milk to drink, but we have not even a drop for our ffee. It is terrible to have to see one's children fade way. They are entirely innocent of the war, and y have to suffer the most. If it is possible for you to c o in any way, please send us milk."

These are letters from German mothers. In t face of such statements, right out of the heart-life of ave, sad women, the pictures of tiny children pinin way and slipping out of life, does it not seem prepo rous that people should argue and haggle and delay tead of sending promptly the relief which will save e?

Lord Cecil of England argues that there ca e no serious shortage of milk in Germany. Judg Ben Lindsey says that with his own eyes he has s the mothers and babies of Germany suffering fr the lack of milk. We have on the one hand the de tion of a man who has not been an eye-witness, and o is a partisan in the struggle now raging; on th ther hand, we have the positive statements of a thor ghly unbiased observer, reporting at first hand to llow citizens of his own neutral nation the things w h he has actually seen. Which of these two stat ents will reasonable Americans accept?

Meanwhile, Peterchen and Malchen are apt die.

Meanwhile, also, Congressman Emerson's s bill is before the House of Representatives, provid for an urgent appeal to the Allies to let America s the babies of Germany, Austria and Poland by al ving milk sent from this country to go through t Red Cross officials in those countries, who guarant tha it shall be used for babies only.

Moving Day

ARE you going to move? May-day behold any vans traversing America's highways, con ying the household chattels of many familie rom one habitat to another.

It is a good thing to move occasionally. R bish can be left behind. There is a chance to le off careless habits. The freshness of new surrou ings and new opportunities will stimulate the mem rs of the household to more vigorous, more efficie and often happier living.

How long is it since you made a forward m e in your spiritual career? Isaiah urges: "Enla the place of thy tent; stretch forth the curtains thy habitation; lengthen thy cords, strengthe thy stakes." The pregnant career of the mighty wish nation began when Jehovah said to Abram: Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindre and from thy father's house, unto a land that I wi how thee." The writer of the great Epistle to the H rews urges: "Therefore leaving the doctrine of t first principles of Christ, let us press on unto perfe on." St. Paul exults: "But we all, with unveile ace, reflecting as a mirror the glory of the Lord, are ans-formed into the same image from glory to ry."

There is only one way to move: that is, to lea the place of our present abode and go to anothe To reach a higher, better spiritual habitat we mus ave the one we now occupy. Old doubts, old fea old compromises, old hesitancies, must come to a end. We must act literally and suddenly, with ong definite, positive will-power, upon the apostle's hor-tation: "Let us lay aside every weight, and si which doth so easily beset us."

By cart, by van, by train, our household goo will make their way on moving day to the new mes. But there is, after all, only one method of tran rtation to the newer, purer soul-home—that is the y of faith. Christ made provision long ago that eac of us might dwell in a place of spiritual sunshi and health and victory. Shall we continue, then, live any longer where the fogs settle and the air is p ned with gloom? "According to your faith be i unto you." "Having therefore these promises, arly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthi s of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness and fear the Lord." "Remember ye not the former things, ther consider the things of old. Behold, I will do new thing. Now it shall take place. This people ve I formed for myself; they shall show forth my p se.

Evolution in Intellect

EDWARD P. MITCHELL, an editor of the New York Sun, in an address at the Park Avenue M. E. Church of New York, rec tly, attacked the theory of evolutic in the mental realm. He said: "S ce Adam delved and Eve stitched, th has not been the slightest intrinsic ch ge in the human n ind." He said th we have the advantage of all the ac mulated wisdom of the sixty centu s as our own heritage, and yet, wi all this advantage, the modern nati ability is not a particle superior to th of the ancients. There are many th ries of evolution, all the way from th atheistical claim that life be is with the lowest materia ell, in which by the fortuitc concourse of atoms it is sp taneously generated, adva ing through the material, ph ical, mental, moral and sp tual realms (which is unsc tific, unscriptural and untru), up to the theistical theor of evolution which takes G as the Creator into acco t. There are many good sc lars who, though admitti that evolution is used by m y as a working hypothesis, de that science has proven it. Sc ce has never found the mi ing link and never will, be use God left it out at the st. Many more, including th advanced in scholarship, lik editor Mitchell, deny that th aw of evolution obtains in th mental world. They say th no poet from Homer's ti to this moment has ever ap ared greater, if so great, as he and that no statesman or la iver has ever equaled M es, whose laws are the ba of jurisprudence for the ru g empires of the world. In he religious realm evoluti as generally interpreted, ha gone to pieces in the prese of Christ. It is dumb in at mpting to account for him, th perfect one, and only perfe one who ever appeared, w back nineteen hundred ye s ago. Before a mistaken in pretation of science shall as Christians to change their th logy, not only without scie fic authority but contrary to cientific fact, it must expl the fact that humanity re hed its perfection in the di centuries past in a poor ca enter's son, born in a cattl stable at Bethlehem. Real science h proven that life must come from li Spiritual life comes scientifically, as vell as theologically and Biblically, b he God-life imparted to man in reg ration by Christ, the perfect Man a Son of God, who came to the earth a went to the cross to make such a new bi h possible, and who said, "Marvel n that I said unto thee, Ye must be born a n." (John 3 : 7.)

Prevents Education

A MAN living in New York City was recently summoned to court to g er with Vincenza, his fourteen-year-ol daughter, and was charged with v ating the compulsory education law b keeping her away from school for f y days since the first of the year. " vo days a week is enough for any gi " the father explained through an in rpreter. "Is that so?" said the m gistrate. "Well, you can go to the T bs for three days and think the m ter over." No provision of society is wiser than that for the education of children, and for compelling parents to send their children to the public schools, which are open to rich and poor alike. For this poor man coming to our shores, ignorant of our language and customs, there should be a feeling of pity mingled with our indignation. He doubtless came from a country where woman is counted only a little better than a slave, where she works in the field as a farm hand, carries burdens on her head heavy enough for a beast of burden, and is harnessed alongside of a steer or dog to pull a cart. A fourth of the people of the world today believe the birth of a girl baby is a curse visited upon the family for some sin. Up to fifty or seventy-five years ago many intelligent people in this land thought a higher education for girls was unnecessary; that little or no education was necessary to do the things they thought women were made for; to cook, sew, wash and iron, get married, and raise a family. What a blessed change in the appreciation of the value of a girl in the family, and her thorough equipment in the largest and highest education! The Mosaic law put a high estimate on childhood, and thus rigidly demanded its education: "And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children." (Deut. 6 : 7.)

The Blind Assist Blind Soldiers

WHAT a beautiful picture this is of the afflicted ministering to their fellow sufferers!—blind people making books for soldiers blinded in the European war! •The whole work is executed by the blind, and in the main by women. No material help could compare with this ministry of education to the mental and moral nature, broadening the vision to the limitless realms of truth, and opening the widest ranges of usefulness and enjoyment. What progress science has made! How merciful it is to teach those from whom the light of day has been shut out to read by the delicate touch of the finger tips! Many of the afflicted ones will again be able to read the stories they read in the Bible at the home or in the Sunday school, and to touch God's heart in the text of the Gospel, as well as in the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. It is not the mortal eye that sees truth or love; it is the mind that perceives truth, the heart that apprehends love, the soul that beholds God. Those making such books can use these words: "I was eyes to the blind." (Job 29 : 15.)

Pleased at Saving Rags

SECRETARY OF COMMERCE REDFIELD expresses satisfaction over the cooperation given his campaign to have every one aid in saving rags and scraps of paper to offset the threatened shortage of raw material for the manufacture of paper. "I find," he said, "that editors everywhere are helping me to get this before the public. The question is serious, much more than the average citizen realizes. We sent out a million circulars and are having more printed. We have to cover every part of the country with them. I do not believe there is any effort to corner the waste paper market of the country. I think all classes will aid my department in this matter as much as they can." The forests are being consumed for wood pulp for paper manufacturing, and the effort of Secretary Redfield to avert a paper famine is praiseworthy, and is meeting with a just public response. The saving of old rags and paper is in harmony with the economy which Christ taught in these words: "Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost." (John 6 : 12.)

Painted Fish Gills Red

WINTER cod, French pickerel and frozen mackerel, all with dry purple gills painted a rosy red, were confiscated the other day by the Board of Health of New York City following an examination of one of the stands at the Williamsburg Bridge public market. The woman who had charge of the stall was charged with having painted the gills of the fish with a coal tar preparation, and was summoned to appear at the Municipal Court term on the complaint of selling impure food. The inspector discovered the woman applying the carmine fluid to the fish. The paint had been used to give the fish the appearance of freshness. The law looked very seriously on this woman's act, for she was not only practicing deceit but was imperiling health and even life in selling stale fish. Fatal ptomaine poisoning from fish with dry and purple gills and from other impure foods is common, and the health authorities are wise in the precautions they are taking to prevent it. The woman in the market pushed off poison on her customers instead of wholesome food for the cold money there was in it for her. Cheating in business is not only against human law, but against the divine law, as thus expressed: "A false balance is abomination to the Lord: but a just weight is his delight." (Prov. 11 : 1.)

Farmers Throw Milk Away

MEMBERS of the Northern Ohio Milk Dealers' Association are reported as feeding their milk to the pigs and cattle, and in some instances throwing it out into the ditches rather than ship it to Cleveland at what they claim is a loss. Members of the association who say they furnished eighty per cent. of the milk supply of Cleveland are demanding fifteen cents a gallon for six months from April 1 and a twenty-cent rate for the winter months. The former price was from twelve to fourteen cents a gallon. It is to be hoped that the farmers and dealers will come to a settlement mutually profitable without rushing up the price too high to the consumer. The early Hebrews were cattle-raisers and milk-producers. They had bottled milk to drink. "And he said unto her, Give me, I pray thee, a little water to drink; for I am thirsty. And she opened a bottle of milk and gave him drink." (Judges 4 : 19.)

Breathes Life into Babe

A BABY born apparently dead to a mother in Haverhill, Mass., was revived twenty minutes later, according to a statement made by the attending physician. Use of a stethoscope failed to show a sign of life when the baby was born, but the doctor breathed into the child's mouth constantly for twenty minutes. Then the infant gasped. A pulmotor was sent for and renewed efforts were made. At the end of twenty-nine more minutes the child was breathing normally; then it began to cry and food was administered. Some accounts of the incident claimed the raising to life of the dead babe by the breath of the physician. We do not believe this. The spark of life was there, though the delicate instrument could not detect it, or the doctor might have breathed into the mouth of the child and worked his pulmotor for a fortnight to no avail. The prophet by the power of God restored to life a child that was actually dead, using the human instrumentality of breathing into the mouth of the child: "And he went up, and lay upon the child, and put his mouth upon his mouth, and his eyes upon his eyes, and his hands upon his hands; and he stretched himself upon the child; and the flesh of the child waxed warm." (II Kings 4 : 34.)

The Reformation of the Lumberjack

By HERBERT GRISSOM

READERS of Stewart Edward White and other writers of forest life know the lumberjack—the man of the ax, the saw and the peavey—as an exceedingly tough citizen. He has been portrayed as a fighting, drinking, gambling bravo, picturesquely pugnacious and profanely contemptuous of law and order, ever ready to greet trouble with horny fists and iron-shod boot-heels.

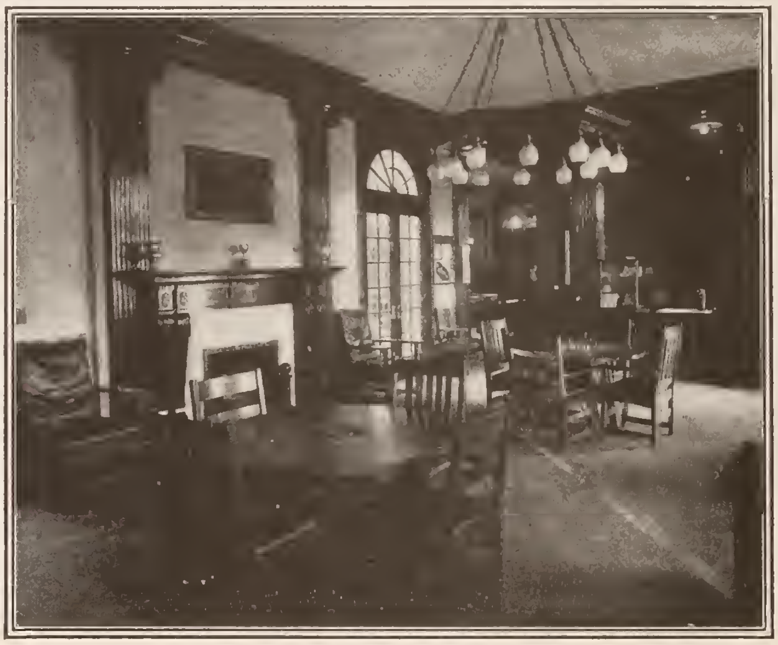
Doubtless that description fitted the character of other days. But behold the lumberjack of today, a desirable member of society, a quiet, temperate, orderly person, whose standard of public and private conduct is fully as high as that of the sober city mechanic. The brawling, rowdy type of woodsman would no more be tolerated in a well conducted lumber camp today than would a disturber of like disposition be permitted to disrupt the serene quiet of a residence community in town.

The passing of the tough lumberjack of other days is a remarkable illustration of the effect which wholesome physical conditions have on moral character. It emphasizes the literal truth of the precept, "Cleanliness is next to godliness." While it is true that provision for orderly and sober recreation is an important feature of modern lumber-camp equipment, and even a religious tendency is to be noted in some instances, the great reform in the woodsworkers found its first inspiration in decent physical conditions. The banishment of booze, brawling and gambling came after the advent of the bath and the broom.

THE first attempts to better living conditions for the lumberjack were not inspired, it is said, by any humanitarian impulse; it was a matter of selfish business. Some far-sighted lumber manufacturer conceived the idea, a few years ago, that he could attract a better class of workmen to his woods camps, hold his working forces together longer, and receive more efficient service, if he made his camps sanitary and generally attractive. As the first minor reforms were elaborated on, the lumbermen employers found themselves growing interested in a philanthropic sense, and facilities for social and moral betterment were added to provision for better physical conditions.

As the welfare work grew in extent the lumbermen naturally turned to the industrial department of the Young Men's Christian Association for aid. The ready response from that quarter has developed a cooperative organization that now includes the lumber manufacturers, the international committee of the Y. M. C. A., and representatives of the woodsworking forces in practically every district where lumber operations are conducted on an extensive scale.

In the old days, woodsworkers were housed in crowded bunk-houses, where they ate, slept, played and fought. No attention was paid to comfort, cleanliness or sanitation, and there was little effort at regulation, so far as the conduct of the men in leisure hours was concerned. Some idea of how all that has been changed may be had from a brief description of a typical Southern camp of today—that of the Crossett Lumber Company, in the depths of the yellow pine forest of Arkansas.



Who would not be a lumberman when such a room as this is provided for him to play chess in?

ONCE this camp was made up of an extremely rough company of whites and blacks—all men. No respectable woman could have remained there. Today a majority of the workers, still both whites and blacks, have their families th them and the camp is as orderly , a New England village. Portable ot-tages provide the living quai rs. The camp is laid off in streets, a in the center of the village is a grou of buildings including a dining-hall nd kitchen, where the single men are d; a company store, and a Y. M. C. A. building—all large structures, bu all built in sections so they may be m ed as occasion requires. There is a a medical dispensary and emerg cy hospital. The streets and all the houses are ele ri-cally lighted.

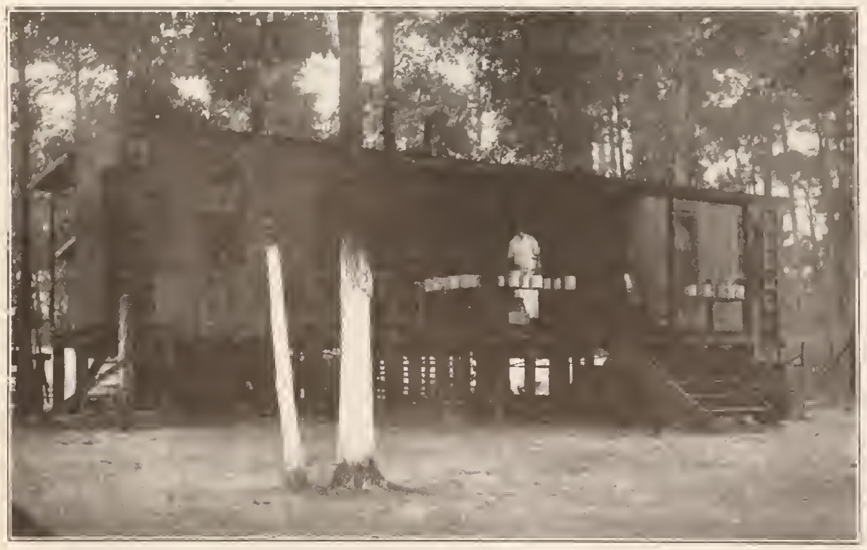
The Young Men's Christian Association, in ch ge of J. O. Heinnicutt, secretary, is the community n-ter. It has reading, writing and game rooms, sh er baths of hot and cold water, a circulating library, nd a gymnasium which is used as an a li-torium for religious services, conc s, motion picture shows and amateur e r-tainments. It is headquarters for a b e-ball club, a women's club which as exclusive use of it one day each week, d various musical and social organizati s. The motion picture shows, given with e camp's own projecting machine, are ad r-tised by posters. Sunday school d church services are held in the Y. M. C. A. auditorium.

Dr. C. L. Vines, the camp surgeon, is supervision over sanitation. The reg a-tions are amazingly thorough. Ther is not a trace of rubbish or trash in si t. The surgeon makes regular rounds of n l-ical inspection, and all cases of illness e given immediate investigation and tr -ment. When there is an accident, e y worker is qualified to give intelligent " t aid," since all are trained in such w k through lectures by the surgeon d instructions from a first aid manual iss d by the company.

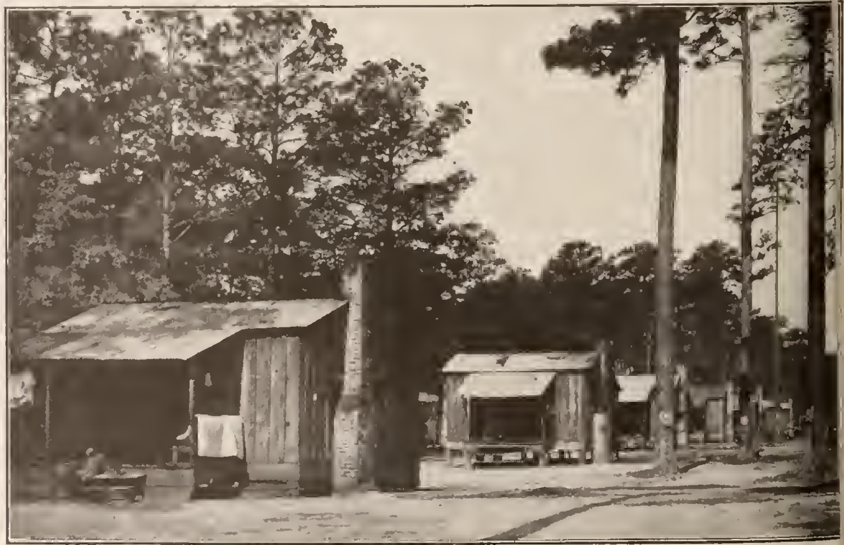
AS to the effect of this sort of ca p environment, L. R. Wilcoxen, logg g superintendent, enthusiastically testi s. Wilcoxen is a keen-eyed, hard-fis d "woods boss," who first qualified y s ago for his position of command by dem -strating his ability to handle unruly l -berjacks. He worked his way up fi n waterboy.

"This used to be a tough camp," he said, "as to h as they make 'em. The men were a hard-drink , hard-fighting, hard-gambling lot, who considered x o'clock at night far more important than six o'cl k in the morning, and who looked forward to pay da a lot more intently than they did to getting logs ou f the woods.

"Look at 'em now! This camp is as orderly a a church—and it isn't even policed. Every man in t s



A portable (note the wheels) lumber camp home in the depths of a Louisiana yellow pine forest



A genuine and beautiful "Pine Avenue" occupied by the snug homes of negro lumbermen place works and plays on honor. There is no drinking, no gambling, no fighting; a man who tried to start anything like that would not need the attention of the company representatives—the whole camp would rise up and chase him out. Not long ago the men of the camp presented a petition to the company, asking that one-fourth of a day's wages of each be set aside every month to pay a minister to hold religious services regularly. The social life of the camp is so enjoyable that many of the men do not visit town from one year's end to another.

"Does it pay in a business way? Say, under this welfare system the cost of producing logs has been cut down a dollar a thousand board feet. Before we had this system in operation, we were logging two to four miles from the mill, working logs that averaged about ninety-six feet and in timber that averaged 7,000 to the acre; later, after we adopted the system, we moved out twenty miles from town, where the logs averaged one hundred and twenty feet and the timber averaged 8,000 per acre; yet under the system, the cost of delivering at the mill dropped fifty cents a thousand. That means we saved the company $40,000 on a year's work. But I don't believe anyone thinks much about its paying in dollars and cents."

CONDITIONS similar to those on the Crossett Company's properties are to be found in many places in the Southern yellow pine region, as well as in the Northwest and Northeast. One of the first lumbermen's Young Men's Christian Associations established in the older lumbering region of the Northeast was at Greenville Junction, Me., where the Hollingsworth & Whitney Company erected a building costing $40,000. That structure has forty-seven dormitories, game rooms, bowling alleys, baths, an auditorium, and a fully equipped hospital. At Berlin, N. H., there is a lumbermen's Y. M. C. A. that cost $75,000, a sum made up from a legacy of $40,000 from the estate of the late W. W. Brown, with mill and community subscriptions of $35,000.

At Laurel, Miss., one of the older lumber towns of the yellow pine region, where the white population numbers less than 6,000, there is a Y. M. C. A. building that cost $65,000. There are four big lumber mills in the town and practically all of the money for the Y. M. C. A. building came from them.

The Laurel Y. M. C. A. is particularly for the use of mill employees in the town. The several companies maintain camps in the woods. One camp, that of the Wausau Lumber Company, is more or less typical of all. There the housing arrangements for the men—there is not a woman in camp—are mammoth cars all on wheels, fitted up as dwellings and standing in a long row. In front of these cars is a sidewalk of hard-packed cinders, graded and drained; steps lead up to each habitation. There is a club house, and a bath house equipped with showers of hot and cold water.

Probably the most remarkable example of the change in the lumberjack's condition in the last few years is at Bogalusa, La., a city of 10,000, occupying a site that ten years ago was the heart of a yellow pine forest. Bogalusa has a fully equipped Y. M. C. A. building that cost $40,000. There is also a hospital that cost as much more, with a resident surgeon and a competent staff of trained nurses. There is a Camp Fire club-house for girls, occupying a plot of ground several acres in extent. There is a city park equipped with seats, swings, and a band-stand where weekly free concerts are given. This town was founded and developed by the Great Southern Lumber Company, whose mills are there. Its principal logging camps, fifty miles from town, are also completely equipped with comforts and conveniences for wholesome and decent living.

Wireless Messages as Contraband

THE censorship of the wireless telegraph stations both afloat and ashore along America's long coast lines is one of the most baffling problems of the war. Within a comparatively recent date the government has issued drastic orders that the wireless apparatus of every incoming steamer of any of the belligerent powers should be put out of commission. The vessels are boarded by officials who remove the antennæ which receive or transmit wireless messages, thus rendering it impossible to operate the apparatus. As long as these vessels remain in an American port the wireless telegraph must remain absolutely silent.

This course has been taken by the United States officials in order to assure strict neutrality. The wireless message has created an entirely new problem in international law. The highest legal authorities at present differ radically as to how this intangible electric current, which springs across the oceans from continent to continent, is to be recognized under the law. The courts know how to treat, for instance, the messages which are flashed under sea over the submarine cables; but the wireless message is an entirely different matter. The whole problem turns on the question whether or not the wireless message may be considered contraband of war.

The problem is far more complicated than the layman may imagine. Shortly after the beginning of the war government inspectors boarded all incoming ships and sealed the wireless apparatus. An official censor was placed in the great wireless stations which were in communication with foreign countries. The government has taken the legal position that every ship of any belligerent nation by the aid of its wireless apparatus may become a dangerous spy, and that it would be a breach of neutrality to permit it to act in American waters. There are of course hundreds of ships flying the flags of the warring nations in American ports, and since practically every ship nowadays is equipped with wireless electricity, it would be impossible to place censors in every wireless room.

There is something almost uncanny in the thought that by a touch of one of the keys wireless messages may overleap oceans and continents, crossing the most powerful fortifications of an enemy's frontier. The messages may be picked up by ships at sea and relayed so that the vessels widely scattered will act as stepping-stones. In this way information of the most vital interest might be transmitted from American soil. It would not be impossible to direct armies or squadrons of warships, and determine the effects of great battles, from American soil.

A difficult problem is also presented by the hundreds of amateur wireless stations along our coast lines. Many of these are sufficiently powerful to transmit messages far out to sea, where they might be picked up by the warships of the belligerent nations. All of them are capable of intercepting messages sent out from such ships, or even from the powerful nations on the other side of the Atlantic. Each of these stations becomes, therefore, a possible spy, actively engaged in furthering the interests of one of the warring nations, although operating on American soil. To control these amateur stations, the official wireless operators sift out the air every night most thoroughly, in the effort to discover any contraband message.

The wireless situation has already aroused a great deal of learned legal discussion. It is argued by some authorities that the wireless message, despite its peculiar character, has the same legal status as an ordinary dispatch, and that a dispatch boat, even in time of war, cannot be interfered with by any neutral nation. The argument is advanced by other legal authorities that a wireless message is clearly conditional contraband, which includes all material used in transmitting telegraph, telephone or wireless messages, and may therefore be controlled by government officials. There are no legal decisions on record to serve as references, and the United States is therefore obliged, for the first time in history, to establish a precedent for the neutrality of wireless messages.

Our Alaskan Frontier

CONTINUING FRANK G. CARPENTER'S NARRATIVE

(Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter)

THIS letter is about the Kenai Peninsula and the short valleys just north of it, through which Uncle Sam is now building the first section of the railroad from Seward to Fairbanks. I am writing at Sunrise, on the northern end of the peninsula, on the shores of Turnagain Arm. I am within a few miles of the end of the Alaska Northern Railway, which Uncle Sam bought of the builders, and, as the crow flies, within twenty or thirty miles of Anchorage, the present headquarters of the railroad construction. I have come here from Seward, across country, as described in my last letter, and am now waiting for a motor boat of some kind to take me out of Turnagain Arm into Cook Inlet and on up Knik Arm to Anchorage.

The Department of Agriculture has just completed a soil survey of the country. Two of its experts, Mr. Hugh H. Bennett and Mr. Thomas D. Rice, have recently traveled over it to estimate its farming possibilities, and their work will be accessible to the public through the department at Washington. They have explored the whole peninsula, and have investigated also the Matanuska and Susitna Valleys, all of which are to be opened to settlers by the new railroad. The experts of the Geological Survey have completed a book of over 200 pages on the mineral resources of the peninsula, and the government is doing all it can to inform the people as to the actual conditions here. The results of its work are valuable, and any one expecting to go to Alaska should study the subject through Uncle Sam's recent researches. I would say also that no one should go without thoroughly understanding the conditions, and that the "want-to-get-rich-quick" man should stay away. The development of the country will be necessarily slow, and the making of money and the building up of a home in the wilds will be a long-time proposition.

And now let us take a look at the first country to be opened by the government railroad. It will be the Kenai Peninsula and the Matanuska and Susitna Valleys just north of it. Within a year from now there will be regular trains running across the peninsula from Seward to Anchorage, and the road should be completed from the latter town up the Matanuska Valley to the coalfields. The distance from Seward to Anchorage is less than one hundred miles and the tracks of the Alaska Northern Railroad already reach more than three-fourths of the way. So far the government has done practically nothing to repair the tracks of the Alaska Northern and to put it into condition. But there is a gasoline car which runs northward from Seward daily for a distance of forty-five miles, and this is being operated for the government. The rates of passage are about 7 cents a mile, and freights are correspondingly high.

A large number of homesteads have already been taken up along the line of the railroad, although no cultivation or clearing of any great extent has been done. Northward from Anchorage in the Matanuska and Susitna Valleys, homesteads are now being taken up and about two hundred farms have already been registered along Knik Arm. There are several thousand people living at Anchorage, several hundred at Knik, and others are preparing to cut farms out of the woods of the Matanuska Valley and along the Susitna. Many are planning to get farms near the coal lands.

These skins came from one day's hunting

ON the Kenai Peninsula the only large center of population is Seward. The other settlements are mining camps or little collections of log cabins occupied by prospectors who are traveling over the peninsula, looking for gold. There are two such camps on Turnagain Arm. One is at Sunrise, where I am now writing, and another is at Hope, a few miles to the westward. Both camps have altogether not over two hundred inhabitants.

Sunrise has perhaps twenty log cabins. In one is a general store, kept by an old German, and another is Arno Liebischer's roadhouse, where I am living. Adjoining the roadhouse is a shack about as big as a hall bedroom, with the words "U. S. Post Office" over the door. Many of the other cabins are empty. They were built when Sunrise was the center of a mining excitement and one thousand-odd prospectors were washing the sands of Six-Mile River and the other creeks about here for gold. Today a dredge made in Seattle is turning up the bed of the river, but the profits are little, because the dredge buckets, which hold only two cubic feet, are too small. Farther up the river is Duncan Stewart's mining camp, where they are dredging at a profit, and where are quartz mines said to be good.

Coal is known to exist in the western part of the peninsula, and it was mined there by the Russians, who brought in laborers from Siberia and miners from Germany with a view to developing the territory. Later one of the American steamship companies took some of the coal to San Francisco, but it was found of too low a grade to be valuable. It is lignite, varying in color from black to brown, and it cracks upon drying. There are great quantities of it north of Kachemak Bay, and the entire Kenai lowland may be coal-bearing. This coal will furnish fuel for the farmers, and run through gas producers it might be used for manufacturing purposes.

The great future of the Kenai Peninsula lies in its farms. The Agricultural Department experts who went over the country a year or so ago ha e estimated that there are on the p insula and in the Matanuska and Sus a Valleys, where the railroad is no build ing, something like four milli acre of fairly good land. This pa of th country is low and it has an quabl climate. Some of the region is vere with swamp and muskeg wh wil need draining, but at least -thir of it will require clearing onl to b made ready for crops. The la of th latter character is enough t mak more than eight thousand far of quarter of a section each, or fo thou sand farms of 320 acres, whic is th amount of land now allowe for homestead in Alaska.

IF weeds, grass and bushes e any sign of fertility, much of this untr will produce excellent crops. ere a Sunrise, outside the roads an trails the land is a jungle of dense egetation and one wades through eds a high as his head. I have fou high grass in every open place in th orest and some of it is so thick tha ma a short distance away is hidd from view. There is grass on the tream bottoms, on the benches and p th slopes of the hills even ab the timber line. The most comm is redtop that grows to the h ht o five or six feet, and, as I am tol nake excellent hay. Indeed it is cut r that purpose about Sunrise and Sew l. I brings from $10 to $12 per to whe first harvested, and in the win rise to $20 and upward per ton.

There is good forage almos everywhere in this part of Alaska, nd it would seem that the country m ht become a stock-raising section. cording to the farming experts, th is the destiny of much of this region They figure that the territory I h e described will support 162,000 st , and allow eight acres per animal. They say the country should be voted also to dairying, and that perly used it can be made to produc something like 25,000,000 pounds o utter or 60,000,000 pounds of cheese year. It is in about the same latitude parts of Finland and the Scandinavi Peninsula, which are celebrated f their butter and eese, and the cl ate is fully as m . In this connec n the Island of diak about 100 les or so west of ward also promis to be a great rying and stock ising center.

So far w have had no exp ment stations the Kenai Pe sula, although o will now be esta ished to show wh can be done. e experts of t Department o Agriculture sa that early vari s of grain will ture, and that arley and oats w produce exce lent crops. Ac ding to them 20 bushels of pota s to an acre be grown on th good soils witho fertilization, and cabbage, lettuce, eets, turnips, garden peas and carro can be raised without trouble. rawberries have been grown in plac and there are wild raspberries almost everywhere. I have seen wild curran and blueberries in the woods. The is a low bush cranberry that make very good jam, and a high bush cra erry th makes excellent jelly. There are al salmonberries and squawberries.

he climate of the Kenai Peninsula is ar different from what one would exct from its place on the map. It is mperate rather than frigid, and it copares favorably with that of our noh central states. The Japanese cuent which flows along the southern shes of Alaska makes it so warm th the sea never freezes at Seward. T greater part of Cook Inlet is open thughout the winter, and the warm cotal waters give the country a tempete summer and a winter that is on moderately cold. Here at Sunrise th have kept records for eight or ni years, and the winter temperature avages about fourteen degrees above ze, rising to seventeen above in Deceber and February and falling to as lo as nine in January. The average spng temperature is about thirtyth degrees and in the summer the thmometer has an average of fiftyon although it goes up to seventyeig and seventy-nine at some times.

ie peninsula is about as far north as tockholm or Petrograd. This gives it ng days during the summer, and in pas of June and July there is practicly no night at all. The growth of cros is produced by the amount of sught they get, and for this reason the people claim that they have a greing season quite as long as that in he northern parts of the States. Tl begins some time in May, and contis until along in September. The pele add to the growing season by staing their vegetables in hotbeds an hothouses, and many sprout their otoes indoors, putting down a layer of tatoes, then a layer of earth, then a ler of potatoes, and so on. When thveather warms up they set out the spits, and thus gain several weeks on ack Frost. The summer season at Serd is about 146 days, and there is a riod of 135 days in the summer dung which no frost has been recorded. Th average growing season over the whe region is perhaps 110 days, or s long as that of much of the noiern parts of the United States prer.

THE most of this country is well wooded. The best trees are in the lownds and on the lower slopes of the mctains, the timber stopping at abt 2,000 feet. The woods are in gres of spruce, hemlock and poplar, wi patches of bushes and open meadow between. The open places have bee largely caused by forest fires, and yo requently find considerable areas of de and down timber. The trees are usly small. A few of the spruces arenore than two feet in diameter, bu many are no bigger around than telraph poles. The poplars grow in der forests. They are tall, straight anbeautiful. There are cottonwoods in e lowlands that reach a thickness of o or three feet. The best trees arn the best lands, and nearly everywhe trees large enough for log cabins are be had. So far much of the timbers protected by the government reservions, and in Seward they pay high for umber, which has been brought fro Puget Sound, a distance as great as at between Cape Cod and the Missou River. This is so notwithstanding here is fairly good timber ten or twe miles away. Indeed, most people Alaska think the country is overcorved.

lave made some inquiries as to the cos of clearing the land. It ranges fro $100 to several hundred dollars peracre. Even the first figure seems big until one considers that $100 in lab would not begin to clear and prepar for cultivation any of the wooded far lands of the states. Every acre of io, Virginia, Tennessee and Kentuc has cost more than that to cut do the trees and get out the roots. Su clearing will be much cheaper her The reason is that the roots are clo to the surface. They spread out lik, net under a thin coating of moss ancoil, and as soon as the tree dies the tumps can be torn out by a good tea of horses. It is only in a few pla that dynamite will be needed, an the ground is burned over most of stumps can be jerked out with a og hain and a team. The trees are soft and easy to cut and the roots can be torn out by the plow.

The greater part of the land is covered with moss, which, in places, is a foot or so deep. The soil is wet and so sour it needs lime. It seldom produces good crops at the start, and needs to be broken up and exposed to the air to sweeten it. There is a great difference in the soils of the peninsula, quite as much as in the United States, and the would-be settler should consider such things in selecting his land. There are vast quantities of muskeg, a sort of marsh, consisting of peat so saturated with water that it is boggy during the summer. It is of no good whatever except when well drained.

There are other lands which are underlaid with a stratum of ice, and some where there is ice and frozen earth for no one knows how deep. This land is usually covered with moss, which is a non-conductor of heat, and the frozen condition beneath is supposed to have existed for thousands of years. It is only by burning off the moss that the ground can be thawed, and it will take a long time to get all of the frost out.

THE settlers of the Kenai Peninsula will have a game country that compares favorably with the eastern United States in colonial times. This is one of the best big game regions of Alaska. It is already attracting the attention of sportsmen, and the number of city men who come here to hunt moose and mountain sheep is yearly increasing. The game should be protected, and if so the mountainous regions will be a sportsman's paradise for generations to come.

The country is noted for its moose pastures, and it has the finest moose of the territory. They are plentiful in the central and western parts of the peninsula. There are now also many black bear and brown bear, but as the farms are cut out these will be crowded back to the mountains. There are many fur animals, such as the lynx, land otter, marten, ermine and mink, and there is no doubt that fur-farming could be successfully carried on. There are flocks of wild birds, such as ducks, geese and snipe, and grouse and ptarmigan are to be had almost everywhere.

The peninsula has numerous streams and lakes which are filled with fish and in the summer the salmon run up the rivers that flow into Cook Inlet and Resurrection Bay. During my stay here I have had all the fish and game I could eat. The trout and salmon are especially fine. Fresh moose meat is for sale in all the towns during the open season. It brings from twelve to fifteen cents a pound, and a single animal dressed will often weigh half a ton. At one village seventy carcasses were sold last year.

SECRETARY GEORGE A. SANFORD, of the Army Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association, 215 West Twenty-third Street, New York City, reports that every year more than 1,500 young soldiers in New York Harbor join the enlisted men's Bible-Reading and Prayer League. He says: "They represent the best class of young men who join the army. When they are sent to their permanent posts—which is often in Hawaii, Panama, the Philippine Islands and other isolated places—we outfit them with a New Testament and a calendar of daily readings. To these soldiers an occasional magazine or religious paper would be a godsend, and we invite all who are interested to cooperate with us in sending two or three times a month a few of the papers, especially religious papers of the type of the Christian Herald, after they have finished with them. The name and address of a soldier will be sent for this purpose."

IN the campaign which Evangelist R. E. Johnson recently closed at Red Bank, N. J., there was a record of 1,088 decisions for Christ and many reconsecrations. Crowds of men attended the Sunday afternoon meetings for men only. On the closing Sunday hundreds of men marched to the tabernacle, headed by a brass band. On another occasion, between four and five hundred women marched.

THE annual convention of the International Union of Gospel Missions will be held in St. Paul's M. E. Church at Toledo, Ohio, May 17-21, 1916. Dr. Harris H. Gregg of St. Louis, Mo., will have charge of the Bible Study hours and Professor E. O. Excell and Professor Roper will have charge of the singing.

HI MILK QUESTION

By GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL LUTZ

CHAPTER XXIV—Continued

WHEN the Lone Fox Camp was reached and the men sent out on their belated task, Gardley decided not to go with them back to meet Kemp and the other men, but sent word that he had gone the short cut to Ashland, hoping to get to a part of the evening rehearsal.

Now that short cut led him to the lonely crossing of the trail much sooner than Kemp and the others could reach it from the rendezvous; and there, in cramped positions, and with much unnecessary cursiug and impatience, four stroug masked men had been concealed for four long hours.

Through the stillness of the twilight rode Gardley, thinking of Margaret, and for once utterly off his guard. His long day's work was done, and though he had not been able to get back when he plauned, he was free now; free until the day after tomorrow. He would go at once to her and see if there was anything she wanted him to do.

Then, to help along his enemies, he began to hum a song, his clear voice reaching the ears of the men in ambush:

"Oh, the time is long, mavourneen,
Till I come again, O mavourneen——"

"And the toime'll be longer thun iver, Oim thinkin', ma purty little voorneen!" said an unmistakable voice of Erin through the gathering dusk.

Gardley's horse stopped and Gardley's hand went to his revolver while his other hand lifted the silver whistle to his lips; but four guns bristled at him iu the twilight, the whistle was knocked from his lips before his breath had reached it, some one caught his arms from behind and his own weapon was wrenched from his hand as it weut off. The cry which he at once sent forth was stifled in its first whisper in a great muffling garment flung over his head and drawn tightly about his neck. He was in a fair way to strangle, and the vigorous efforts of body which he made were useless in the hands of so many. He might have been plunged at once into limitless, soundless depths, so futile did any resistance seem. And so, as resistance was useless, he lay like one dead and put all his powers into listening. But neither could he hear much, muffled as he was, and bound hand and foot now, with a gag in his mouth.

They were leading him off the trail and up over rough ground; so much he knew, for the horse stumbled and jolted and strained to carry him. To keep his whirliug senses alive and alert he tried to think where they might be leading him, but the darkness and suffocation dulled his powers. He wondered idly if his men would miss him and come back when they got home to search for him, and then remembered with a pang that they would think him safely in Ashland helping Margaret. They would not be alarmed if he did not return that night, for they would suppose he had stopped at Rogers's on the way and perhaps stayed all night as he had done once or twice before. Margaret! When should be see Margaret now? What would she thiuk?

And then his senses reeled.

WHEN he came somewhat to himself he was in a close, stifling room where candlelight from a distance threw weird shadows over the adobe walls. The watch-like voices of a woman and a girl in harsh cackling laughter, half suppressed, were not far away, and some oue, whose face was covered, was holding a glass to his lips. The smell was sickening, and he remembered that he hated the thought of liquor. It did not fit with those who companied with Margaret. He had never cared for it, and had resolved never to taste it again. But whether he chose or not the liquor was poured down his throat. Huge hands held and forced him.

The liquid burned its way down his throat and seethed into his brain, and a great darkness, mingled with men's wrangling voices and much cursing, swirled about him like some furious torrent of angry waters that finally submerged his consciousness. Theu came deeper darkness and a blank relief from pain.

Hours passed. He heard sounds sometimes, and dreamed dreams which he could not tell from reality. He saw his friends with terror writteu on their faces, while he lay apathetically and could not stir. He saw tears on Margaret's face; and once he was sure he heard Forsythe's voice in contempt: "Well, he seems to be well occupied for the present! No danger of his waking up for a while." And the voices all grew dim and far away again, except those of the old croue, and the harsh girl's. Then he saw Margaret's tears—tears that fell on his heart from far above, and seemed to melt out all his early sins and flood him with their grief. Tears, and the consciousness that he ought to be doiug something for Margaret now, and could uot. Tears!—and still deeper darkness!

CHAPTER XXV

WHEN Margaret got behind the curtain she was aware of many cries and questions hurled at her like an avalanche, but ignoring them all she sprang past the noisy, excited group of young people, darted through the dressing-room to the right and out into the night and coolness. Her head was swimming and things went black before her eyes. She felt that her breath was going and she must get to the air.

But when she passed the hot wave of the schoolroom, and the sharp air of the night struck her face, consciousness seemed to turn and come back to her again; for there over her head was the wideness of the vast Arizona starry night, aud there before her, in Nick Bottom's sombre costume, eating one of the chicken sandwiches that Mrs. Tanner had sent down to her, stood Gardley. He was pale, and shaken from his recent experience, but he was undaunted, and wheu he saw Margaret coming toward him through the doorway with her soul in her eyes and her spirit all aflame with joy and relief, he came to meet her under the stars, and forgettiug everything else just folded her gently in his arms!

It was a most astonishing thing to do, of course, right there outside the dressing room door, with the curtain just about to rise ou the scene aud Gardley's wig not on yet. And he had not even asked nor obtained permission. But the soul sometimes grows impatient and will not wait for the lips to speak, and Margaret felt her trust had been justified and her heart had found its home.

Right there behind the schoolhouse, out in the great wide night, while the crowded clamoring audience waited for them, aud the young actors grew frantic, they plighted their troth, his lips upon hers.

"Come in quick, Mr. Gardley, it's time for the curtain to rise and everybody is ready! Where on earth has Miss Earle vanished to. Miss Earle, oh, Miss Earle!"

THERE was a rush to the dressiug room door to find the missing ones; but Bud, preseut as ever where was the most need, stood with his back to the outside world in the door of the dressiug-room and called loudly:

"They're comin', all right; go on! Get to your places. Miss Earle says to get to your places."

The two iu the darkness groped for each other's hands as they stood suddenly apart, and with one quick pressure and a glance, hurried in. There was not any need for words. They understood, these two, and trusted.

With her cheeks glowiug now, and her eyes like two stars, Margaret fled across the stage aud took her place at the piano again, just as the curtain began to be drawn; and Forsythe, who had been slightly uneasy at the look on her face as she left them, wondered now, and leaned forward to tell her how ell sh was looking.

He kept his honeyed phrase o himself, however, for she was not eedin him. Her eyes were on the ri g curtain, and Forsythe suddenly ememembered that this was the scene whic Jed was to have appeared— d Je had a broken leg! What had rgare doue about it? It was scarcel a par that could be left out. Why n't h thought of it sooner and offere o tak it? He could have bluffed it o somehow—he had heard it so muc -mad up words where he couldn't r embe them all, and it would have een splendid opportunity to do s e re love-making with Rosa. Why n't h thought of it? Why hadn' Rosa Perhaps she hadn't heard al t Je soon enough to suggest it.

The curtain was fully open v, an Bud's voice as Peter Quince, tri high and cracked with ex emen broke the stillness, while t awe audience gazed upon this new trang world presented to them.

"Is all our company here?" ed ou Bud excitedly, and Nick Botto eplie with Gardley's voice:

"You were best to call them g erally man by man, accordiug to the ip."

FORSYTHE turned deadl whit Jasper Kemp, whose keen e wa upon him, saw it through the . Th lieutenant's lips went pale a ther were purple points of fear in eye He looked and looked again, a coul not believe his senses.

Furtively he darted a glance ounc like one about to steal away the seeing Jasper Kemp's keen e upo him settled back with a strai l loo upon his face. And once he tole glance at Margaret and caught r loo all transfigured with great j , an looked again, and felt rebuked nehow by the pureness of her maiden y an trust.

Not once had she turned he yes t his. He was forgotten, and som ow h knew the look he would get if s hould see him. It would be conte t an scorn that would burn his very ıl. is only a maid now and then to hom i is given thus to pierce and b se th soul of a man who plays with e an trust and womanhood for se hness Such a woman never knows he ower She punishes all unconscious t erself It was so that Margaret Earle nconsciously, by her very indiffere e an contempt, showed the little so f thi puppet man to himself.

He stole away at last when he ough no one was looking, and rea d th back of the schoolhouse at the o n doo of the girls' dressing room w re h knew Titania would be p ng i between the acts. He beckone her t his side and began to questio her i quick, eager, almost angry ton as the failure of their plans were faul Had her father been at home da Had anything happened? Any bee there? Did Gardley come? H ther been any report from the me Ha that short, thick-set Scotchman th th ugly grin been there?

She must remember that she as th one to suggest the scheme in e firs place, and it was her business t eep watch. There was no telling n wha might happen.

He turned, and there stood Jaspe Kemp close to his elbow, h shor stature drawn to its full, his ck-s shoulders squaring themselves, s ug grin standing out in bold relief, ena ingly in the night.

The young officer let forth son word not iu a gentleman's code, and t ned t leave the frightened girl, who y th time was almost crying, but asp Kemp kept pace with Forsyth as h walked.

"Was you addressin' me?" aske politely. "Because I could tel you few thiugs a sight more approp te f you than what you just hande ut t me."

Forsythe hurried around to t fro of the schoolhouse, making no ply.

BLACK TREAD, WITH RED SIDES

A Nimble Tire,— and Strong!

NEVER sold "by the pound!" Never sold by the layer,—or on "thickness" (which means stiffness!)

Always sold on its true Pneumatic Tire performance.

Sold on the QUALITY of its materials,—not on their mere Quantity.

A Light-footed, Springy, Quick-acting, Tire which yields to sharp obstacles on the road that would cut into stiffer, thicker, heavier, shorter-lived, Tires.

Made with a flexible Backbone,—that Mileage-adding "Squegee" tread which promptly checks side-skid, and forward-skid, without the use of such unbridged projections as would separate Fabric layers, through uneven pressure and vibration.

Diamond (1916) Treads are of the new black "Velvet" rubber,—proved so free from inert substances (or ballast) by its wonderful Lightness, its Stretch, Spring, and CLING to slippery surfaces.

DIAMOND Tires are made as carefully as if they were to be marketed for twice the "Fair-List" BUSINESS price at which they are sold by Diamond Dealers.

Take off your Car, for a day of comparison, any of the high-priced, fancy-frilled, Tires.

Put on instead, for a day of test, these Fair-Listed, moderate-priced, Diamond Tires.

Then, note how freely your Car responds to Power,—how much easier it takes the hills, —how much more smoothly, with how much less Vibration, it rides over comparatively rough roads.

You will travel farther, for each dollar, than you ever did on Tires,—when you equip with 1916 "Velvet-Rubber" Diamond Tires.

Teaching People How to Eat for Health, Strength and Efficiency

By ARTHUR TRUE BUSWELL, M. D.

IF YOU have ever lived on a farm you have heard of "balanced rations" and what remarkable results they have accomplished when fed to cattle and other animals. The United States Government has a department devoted to teaching farmers how to feed their stock so as to develop it to the highest point of health and efficiency.

Yet until recently I have never heard of "balanced rations" for humans or, in fact, of any serious attempt made to teach people what to eat and what not to eat. I was therefore greatly interested in the work of The Corrective Eating Society of Maywood, New Jersey, founded by Eugene Christian, the eminent food scientist. It seems that this Society is dedicated to teaching people how to combine and proportion food for greater health and efficiency and their work is meeting with success so great that it almost seems too good to be true.

Twenty years ago Eugene Christian was at death's door. For years he had suffered the agonies of acute stomach and intestinal trouble. His doctors—among them the most noted specialists in this country—gave him up to die. He was educated for a doctor, but got no relief from his brother physicians, so as a last resort he commenced to study the food question, especially its relation to the human system, and as a result of what he learned he succeeded in literally eating his way back to perfect health without drugs or medicines of any kind—and in a remarkably short space of time.

To-day Eugene Christian is a man 55 years young. He has more ginger, more vitality, and physical endurance than most youngsters in their 'teens. He literally radiates energy and power.

So remarkable was his recovery that Christian knew he had discovered a great truth which fully developed would result in a new science—the science of Correct Eating.

From that day to this he has devoted his life to telling others of the power of Correct Eating. From his research work he became convinced that 90 per cent of the ills of mankind originate in the stomach and intestines. He found that these ills responded to corrective eating. Since then he has told 23,000 people how to eat, what to eat and what not to eat with the result that almost invariably they were brought back to a type of health that they never dreamed they could reach.

Very often good foods, when eaten in combination with other good foods, create a chemical action in the digestive tract and are converted into dangerous toxic poisons, which are responsible for nearly all sickness. In other words, good foods wrongly combined will cause acidity, fermentation, gas, constipation and numerous sympathetic ills leading to most serious consequences.

These truths have been strongly brought out by Professor Metchnikoff in his treatise on the "Prolongation of Life" and by many other modern scientists. But most efforts in the past have been designed solely to remove the effect, by cleansing out the system and removing the poisons after they had formed, wholly disregarding the cause.

The Corrective Eating Society, however, has gone a step further. Instead of waiting until the poisons accumulate, they tell you how to prevent them. They have shown that just as some combinations of food produce slow consuming poisons that wreck the system, other combinations of food taken in the right proportions become the greatest tonics for health, efficiency and long life ever discovered. And a wonderful feature of their method is that results come practically with the very first meal.

As Christian explains, in no case are patented or proprietary foods prescribed. All of the foods may be obtained from your garden, at your local stores or in any restaurant. It is not necessary to upset your table to follow his remarkably simple suggestions.

In order to help as many people as possible, not only those who are ailing but those who want to maintain their health, The Corrective Eating Society has prepared a book based upon Eugene Christian's 20 years' experience. This book, Corrective Eating in 24 Lessons, is being offered for free examination to those who are interested. This work was written expressly for the layman. Technical terms have been avoided and every point is explained so that there can be no possible misunderstanding.

But the lessons do not merely tell you why you should eat correctly and what the results will be, they also give actual menus for breakfast, luncheon and dinner, curative as well as corrective, covering every condition of health and sickness for all ages from infancy to old age and covering all occupations, climates and seasons.

Christian says that every thinking man or woman—young or old—well or sick—should know the science of correct eating. That most people dig their graves with their teeth is as true as gospel, in his estimation. Food is the fuel of the human system. And just as certain fuels will produce definite results when consumed in a furnace, so will certain foods produce the desired results when put into the human furnace.

Yet not one person in a thousand has any knowledge of food as fuel. Some of the combinations we eat every day are as inefficient and dangerous as soggy wood, wet leaves, mud, sawdust and a little coal would be for a furnace. No wonder most of us are only 50 per cent efficient.

The relationship of health to material success is so close that the result of the Society's teaching is a form of personal efficiency which puts people head and shoulders above their less fortunate brothers. Everyone knows that the best ideas, plans and methods are worked out when you are brimful of vitality—when you feel full of "ginger." The better you feel—the better work you can do. I understand that The Corrective Eating Society's lessons have times without number been the means of bringing great material prosperity to its students by endowing them with health so perfect that work seems like play.

If you would like to see the Book of 24 Lessons in Corrective Eating written by Eugene Christian out of his vast experience, merely write and ask the Society at the address given below to send the lessons for five days' free examination with the understanding that you will either return the lessons within that time or remit $3, the small fee asked.

If the more than 300 pages contained in the course yield but one single suggestion that will bring greater health, you will get many times the cost of the course back in personal benefit—yet hundreds write the Society that they find vital health on every page. (Adv.)

I suggest that you clip out and mail the following form instead of writing a letter, as this is a copy of the official blank used and will be honored at once.

CORRECTIVE EATING SOCIETY, INC., 344 Hunter Ave., Maywood, N. J.

Gentlemen:—You may send me prepaid a copy of Corrective Eating in 24 Lessons. I will either remail these to you in five days or send you $3.

"Nice pleasant evenin' to be free," went on Jasper Kemp looking up at the stars. "Rather onpleasant for some folks that have to be shut up in the guardhouse."

Forsythe wheeled upon him.

"What do you mean?" he demanded angrily, albeit he was white with fear.

"Oh, nothin' much," said Jasper affably; "I was just thinkin' how much pleasanter it was to be a free man than shut up in prison on a night like this."

Forsythe looked at him a moment, a kind of panic of intelligence growing in his face; then he turned and went toward the back of the schoolhouse, where he had left his horse some hours before.

"Where you goin'?" demanded Jasper. "It's most time you went back to your fiddlin', ain't it?"

But Forsythe answered him not a word.

"You think you have to go, then?" said Jasper deprecatingly. "Well, now, that's a pity, seein' you was fiddlin' so nice an' all. Shall I tell them you've gone for your health?"

Thus recalled, Forsythe stared at his tormentor wildly for a second. "Tell them—tell her—" he muttered hoarsely, "tell her I've been taken suddenly sick." And he was off in a wild gallop toward the Fort.

"I'll tell her you've gone for your health!" called Jasper Kemp with his hands to his mouth like a megaphone.

"I reckon he won't return again very soon, either," he chuckled. "This country's better off without such pests as him an' that measly parson." Then turning, he beheld Titania, the queen of the fairies, white and frightened, staring wildly into the starry darkness after the departed rider.

"Poor little fool!" he muttered under his breath as he looked at the girl and turned away. "Poor, pretty little fool!"

Suddenly he stepped up to her side and touched her white-clad shoulder gently:

"Don't you go for to care, lassie," he said in a tender tone. "He ain't worth a tear from your pretty eye. He ain't fit for you to wipe your feet on."

But Rosa turned angrily and stamped her foot.

"Go away! You bad old man!" she shrieked. "Go away! I shall tell my father!" and she flouted herself into the schoolhouse.

Jasper stood looking ruefully after her, shaking his head.

"The little minx!" he said aloud, "the poor, pretty little minx. She'll get her dues a-plenty afore she's done."

That very night Lieutenant Forsythe wired his uncle in the East, who was in the confidence of the powers that be, that it would be to his health's advantage if he could at once be transferred to a more civilized climate.

MEANTIME, inside the schoolhouse, the play went gloriously on to the finish, and Gardley, as Nick Bottom, took the house by storm. Poor absent Jed's father, sent by the sufferer to report it all, stood at the back of the house while tears of pride and disappointment rolled down his cheeks. Pride that Jed had been so well represented, disappointment that it couldn't have been his son up there playacting like that.

The hour was late when the play was over, and Margaret stood at last in front of the stage to receive the congratulations of the entire countryside; while the young actors posed and laughed and chattered excitedly, then went away by twos and threes, their tired, happy voices sounding back along the road. The people from the Fort had been the first to surge around Margaret with their eager congratulations and gushing sentiments. "So sweet, my dear! So perfectly wonderful! You really have got some dandy actors!" and "Why don't you try something lighter—something simpler, don't you know—something really popular, that these poor people could understand and appreciate? A little farce! I could help you pick one out!"

And all the while they gushed, Jasper Kemp and his men, grim and forbidding, stood like a cordon drawn about her to protect her, with Gardley in the c er just behind her as though he h a right there and meant to stay; t at last the Fort people hurried away, nd the schoolhouse grew suddenly e ty with just those two and the eight en behind; and by the door Bud, ta ng to Pop and Mom Wallis in the b k-board outside.

Amid this admiring bodyguard a ast Gardley took Margaret home. Pe ps she wondered a little that they all nt along, but she laid it to their pride i he play and their desire to talk it over.

They had sent Mom and Pop W llis home horseback after all, and ut Margaret and Gardley in the buckb rd, Margaret never dreaming that it as because Gardley was not fit to lk. Indeed, he did not realize himself hy they all stuck so closely to him. H ad lived through so much since Jaspe nd his men had burst into his prison nd freed him, bringing him in hot has to the schoolhouse, with Bud wildly r ng ahead. But it was enough for him sit beside Margaret in the sweet nigh nd remember how she had come out t im under the stars. Her hand lay b de him on the seat, and without inte ng it his own brushed it. Then he lai his gently, reverently down upon hers ith a quiet pressure, and her smaller fi ers thrilled and nestled into his grasp.

In the shadow of a big tree besid he house he bade her good-by, the en busying themselves with turning a out the buckboard noisily, and Bud is-creetly taking himself to the back or to get one of the men a drink of w er.

"You have been suffering in ne way," said Margaret with su en intuition, as she looked up into G d-ley's face. "You have been in ril somehow——"

"A little," he answered lightly. I'll tell you about it tomorrow. I mu n't keep the men waiting now. I shall ve a great deal to tell you tomorro -if you will let me. Good night, Marg t!" Their hands lingered in a clasp, and en he rode away with his bodyguard.

But Margaret did not have to ait until the morrow to hear the stor for Bud was just fairly bursting.

THE Thirty-ninth National Convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of the United States and Canada will meet in Cleveland, Ohio, May 12-16. Among the questions which will come before the convention are these: How dominate the material interests of the Association Movement by the spiritual objective and life? How flood the movement with the evangelistic passion? What is the relation of the church to the young men of North America? What are the forces now tending most to disintegrate faith and character? and How meet the opportunities of the Association Movement in the reconstruction of the Orient, Latin America and Europe? The present membership of the Associations is 620,-799; 759 associations own buildings valued at $77,483,148. In addition, the Foreign Department has 180 secretaries in Japan, China, Korea, India, Mexico, South America, Russia and other foreign lands for which the Association raises $460,000 annually and for which it maintains 75 buildings in the foreign field.

AT Troy, N. Y., on April 2 Evangelists Hart and Magann of Madison Wis began a union tabernacle meeting with thirty-two churches cooperating. They had just closed a campaign at Batavia, N. Y.

Razor blade magnified 1000 times

DON'T LET YOUR RAZOR ABUSE YOUR FACE

THE cutting edge of every razor—"ordinary" or "safety"—consists of microscopic teeth. Magnified 1000 times these teeth look like the teeth of a cross-cut saw. See illustration above.

Now rust forms on these teeth. This makes the blade dull—makes it "pull" and hurt your face.

You don't wipe any "safety" or "ordinary" razor blade dry enough to prevent this "surface rusting." Apply 3-in-One shaving oil before and after shaving. 3-in-One positively prevents rust on any metal.

This is the way to have a perfect shave: Moisten your thumb and forefinger with a few drops of 3-in-One. Draw razor blade between them. Then if an "ordinary" razor, strop in the usual way, first putting a few drops on the strop. You'll be surprised and delighted at the keen edge that comes so quickly and shaves so perfectly.

After shaving, be sure to repeat the oiling. That will absolutely prevent any rust forming between shaves. 3-in-One makes the razor slip over the face "slick and smooth." Also prevents the soap from burning or smarting after even a close shave. 3-in-One shaving oil has a delicate, agreeable flavor.

You can get 3-in-One at any good drug, hardware or general store. 1 oz., 10c.; 3 ozs., 25c.; 8 ozs. (½ pint), 50c. Also in patent Handy Oil Cans, 3½ ozs., 25c.

FREE 3-IN-ONE FOR YOU

A postal will bring you a generous free sample. Also the scientific "Razor Saver" circular. Write this very day and prove these things for your own self.

"TOLEDO MADE FOR THE WHOLE WORLD'S TRADE"

Dependable Spark Plugs

WE will make and sell this year fourteen million Champion Dependable Spark Plugs.

This is twice as many plugs as we produced last year, when our sales greatly exceeded those of all other manufacturers of spark plugs combined.

As our production has increased, so has the uniformity and dependability of our product increased.

And now, after exhaustive competitive tests, four out of five of this year's record output of new cars will be equipped with Champions—over a million new cars.

There is a Champion especially designed to dependably serve your particular motor. See that your dealer furnishes Champions when you replace the plugs in your car. He knows which one will serve it best.

The Great Adventure

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

IT was at a dinner party that the blond lady voiced her astonishing statement. "It is a teaching of a certain religion," said the lady, "that one can control the length of one's life. It is the teaching of that religion that one need not grow old; that death may be put off indefinitely."

The naïve boy at my left looked mildly interested; then he shrugged his shoulders and turned in my direction. "I don't know," he murmured confidentially, "that I want to live forever. A hundred years or so would quite do for me!" He laughed.

I considered the matter gravely. "I don't know that I would want to live forever either," I agreed. "I'd hate to live so long that I would no longer be useful—so long that I would be unable to do the things that I wanted to do. And besides, death would be a great adventure."

The boy nodded understandingly. "Yes," he said, "death probably will be a great adventure, for death can't be just lying still under the earth. What do you think?"

DEATH has meant many things to many great poets. When one stops to think about it, when one reads the many beautiful verses, one begins to think that death really is a great adventure—the adventure that one has never been able to have on earth; the dream that has never materialized; the ambition that has never been fulfilled.

Kipling in his great poem, "L'Envoi," says:

> And those that were good shall be happy; they shall sit on a golden chair:
> They shall splash at a ten-league canvas with brushes of comet's hair;
> They shall find real saints to draw from—Magdalene, Peter and Paul;
> They shall work for an age at a sitting and never be tired at all!

Kipling's idea of the great adventure is work; the kind of work you love most to do, and plenty of time to do that work in.

Bryant in his "Thanatopsis" writes these beautiful lines:

> sustained
> By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
> Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
> About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams!

Bryant's idea of the great adventure is sweet rest and dreams—dreams that no one ever finds on earth.

Tennyson in his "Crossing the Bar" wrote:

> For though from out our bourne of Time and Place
> The flood may bear me far,
> I hope to see my Pilot face to face,
> When I have crossed the bar!

For Tennyson's great adventure is his hope of meeting God—his hope that the Saviour will be waiting for him with a welcoming hand outstretched.

Browning in his "Prospice" feels that love is the great adventure that waits for one in the unexplored country:

> For sudden the worst turns to best for the brave;
> The black minute's at end,
> And the elements' roar, the fiend voices that rave
> Shall dwindle, shall blend,
> Shall change, shall become, first a peace out of pain,
> Then a light, then thy breast,
> Oh, thou soul of my soul. I shall clasp thee again,
> And with God be the rest.

These are the thoughts of some great poets. These are their ideas of what heaven is like—and they are all different. For few people vision the great adventure in the same way.

I was reading Mrs. Eleanor H. Porter's new book, "Just David," a few days ago. It is a wonderful little story of a small boy who is brought up on the top of a lovely mountain; a small boy who knows nothing of the evil in the world, who sees only the beautiful and does not know that fear and horror exist. It is the story of a boy who plays his emotions and dreams on a violin—a boy who knows nothing of death.

One day the little boy found a dead squirrel in the woods.

"Why, daddy, he is asleep and he won't wake up!" he cried. Then, after a gentle touch: "And he's cold—so cold!" The father hurried his son away, but the boy who brought the milk next morning told David that the squirrel was dead. He sought his father, a bit frightened.

"Father," he questioned, "what is it to be—dead?"

The father's explanation and the boy's answer are almost the most beautiful things I have ever read. I am quoting directly from the book:

"'It means that the squirrel, the real squirrel under the fur, has gone away, David.'

"'Where?'

"'To a far country, perhaps.'

"'Will he come back?'

"'No.'

"'Did he want to go?'

"'We'll hope so.'

"'But he left his—his fur coat behind him. Didn't he need—that?'

"'No, or he'd have taken it with him.'

"David was strangely silent at this. He had remained strangely silent, indeed, for some days; then, out in the woods one morning with his father, he gave a joyous shout. He was standing by the ice-covered brook, and looking at the little black hole through which the hurrying water could be plainly seen.

"'Daddy, oh, daddy, I know now how it is—about being dead.'

"'Why, David?'

"'It's like the water in the brook, you know; that's going to a far country, and it isn't coming back. And it leaves its little ice-coat behind it just as the squirrel did, too. It doesn't need it. Don't you see? And it's singing—listen! It's singing as it goes. It wants to go!

THE nice boy was still waiting for my answer. He was a very polite boy, and waited quietly with amused eyes on my face.

"I don't know just what I think," I told him; "I don't know. Great poets have said that after death there comes work, or rest, or pleasant dreams or a friendly, beautiful meeting with the ones we love."

The boy, nice though he was, was laughing at me—almost.

"But," he questioned, "haven't you any preference? What do you hope?"

I was thinking of Mrs. Porter's book.

"Why," I told him, "I hope that death will be a beautiful journey to a far country—and that I'll be able to go singing!"

Called Higher

Many hearts have been made sore by the death of Miss Sarah J. Tibbals which occurred at the Martha Washington Hotel on April 2. Miss Tibbals was born in Milford, Connecticut, and upon removing to New York became a member of University Place Presbyterian Church where she worshipped for forty-five years, and in whose name she established the Vacation House for Working Girls at Ocean Grove. Miss Tibbals lived a life of true Christian simplicity and was beautiful in character and deeds, denying herself always in order that she might have still more to give to the needy to whom she was very generous. The Christian Herald has long counted both Miss Tibbals and her brother Lewis B. Tibbals (who was one of the organizers of the Bowery Mission work) among the best friends of the work carried on by this journal. The brother died in 1895. Early in the history of the Christian Herald Children's Home at Nyack, Miss Tibbals became deeply interested in that work and gave to the institution the beautiful "Tibbal's Cottage Dormitory" which is one of the very best of the splendid dormitories that shelter so many New York waifs through the hot months of the summer. Miss Tibbals comes of an old family whose American ancestry dates from long before the Revolutionary War and their name is inscribed upon a memorial bridge at Milford, Connecticut.

Two sisters, long members of the Christian Herald Family, have recently died, Mrs. James Cheshire of Huntington, Long Island, on January 21, and Mrs. Harriet Burr, Centerport, Long Island, on February 1. Each leaves a son and daughter, and two sisters also survive them.

Her Husband Does the Washing

Mr. Learnhow had to do a week's washing. His wife was sick and Mrs. Kindly, who was taking care of her, refused to wash. "Indeed," said she, "It's the washing that's nearly killed your wife. I can do anything but that!"

FELS-NAPTHA

So Mr. Learnhow decided to test out what he read about Fels-Naptha Soap. Saturday night he bought a cake at the corner grocery. "Is this really good? We've never used it," he asked the grocer. "Well, nearly everybody that buys Fels-Naptha once, buys it always," answered the man.

At five o'clock Monday morning, Mr. Learnhow started to wash. "If this soap does what they say," he thought, "I'll be able to do the wash and get to business on time, too." He followed the directions on the red and green wrapper. While the clothes soaked 30 minutes he brought in the milk, started the fire and put up the clothesline. By the time breakfast was ready he had most of the big pieces on the line.

At seven o'clock there were only some stockings, a few towels and small things left. "Well," said Mrs. Kindly, "if it's as easy and quick as that, I guess I can do it next week. That must be wonderful soap. Your clothes certainly look better than mine ever did, even with the hardest kind of rubbing and boiling. And you scarcely rubbed yours and didn't boil them at all."

It always is "as easy and quick as that" when you use Fels-Naptha Soap. Not only washing, but every soap-and-water household task. Fels-Naptha is the perfect combination of soap with naptha which actually does the hard work for you.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"Go ye therefore and make disciples of all the nations." Matt. 28:19.

Christ's plans embraced all the world, all nations, and all the days. He had mighty designs in his heart. He died for the world: He would come again in the clouds: He would be king of the race. Those far-reaching thoughts have characterized his foremost followers. The Cross might seem obscured in the smoke of battle, and to be swaying backward and forward in the struggle, but they have never entertained a moment's doubt as to its ultimate world-wide victory. Write it on the tablets of your hearts that Jesus claims the sovereignty of mankind, and he will have it, and we shall see it. We shall share in the rapture of that day, of which God holds the secret, when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our God and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever. Take the form of prayer that he taught us. Note how far he sweeps the compass! As there is no corner in the far expanse of heaven where the Father's name is not hallowed and his will is not done, so that time will come when there shall not be a crevice or cranny of our earth which—on account of what Jesus Christ did on the cross and is doing through his church—shall not be filled with the knowledge and love of God, as the ocean bed is filled with the mighty fulness of the ocean waves.

Barnabas the Cheerful

By Arthur H. Howland

BROTHER BARNABAS was a cheerful soul. Of all the New Testament characters except Jesus, he seems to be the one to whom that sweet, homely word "lovable" can best be applied. He is mentioned in connection with scarcely more than a half-dozen events, and yet in almost all of these he has the rôle of the cheer-bringer.

We see him first as he comes forward to give a little company of believers at Jerusalem the proceeds of the property he had owned and sold. The great majority of this first group of Christian believers doubtless had no property at all; few of them had any considerable amount. But Barnabas seems to have been a prosperous citizen, and he gave his wealth freely into the treasury of this needy, struggling company of the followers of Jesus. (Acts 4:36, 37.) When Saul was converted, believers at Jerusalem distrusted him. They knew that he had brought about the imprisonment and death of fellow Christians, and they could not believe that he was sincere in his new profession of the Christian faith. They thought it was simply another trick to get more Christians into trouble. But Barnabas, the cheerful, believed in him. "He took him, and brought him to the apostles," and by his own cheerful confidence made them believe in the sincerity of their new brother.

It was quite natural then that when a messenger was desired to go from Jerusalem up to Antioch and learn at first hand what was going on in the new Christian community there, of whom such good reports were being heard, they should send Barnabas, the cheerful. The two verses that tell how he felt and what he did when he got to Antioch and the description of the sort of man he was, are worthy of special note: "When he came, and had seen the grace of God, [he] was glad, and exhorted them all, that with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord. For he was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith." Naturally, then, when such a man saw such things and experienced such gladness, "much people were added unto the Lord."

Then Barnabas did another kind thing. Saul had gone back to his own home town, Tarsus. Barnabas probably thought he was lonely back there, and ought to return at once to the active work of pushing the Christian propaganda. It seemed to his consecrated judgment that this man Saul would be the best leader for the apostles' work in Antioch, so he hurried down to Tarsus, got him, and brought him with him to Antioch. There they had a happy year, associating with the Christians in that city and teaching the people. It was just at this time, when cheerful Barnabas was working with the vigorous, impetuous Saul at Antioch, that the believers were first called Christians. It is a happy fact that that lovely word first came into use in connection with Barnabas. He was a good sample to the citizens of Antioch of what a Christian really is. And now, after nearly 2,000 years, he still shines out, the faithful picture of a real Christian.

Then there was another job of kindness to be done. Back in Jerusalem the believers were suffering from poverty. Barnabas had been used to having plenty of money, and he did not like the idea of his friends and fellow worshipers being in want. It does not say specifically that he started the idea of raising a fund for the poor Christians of Jerusalem, but it is more than likely that it originated with him. At any rate it was he and Saul that undertook the glad mission of conveying this love-gift from the Christians at Antioch to the Christians at Jerusalem.

When they returned to Antioch and had spent some further time in Christian service there, while the believers were praying and asking for special guidance, the Holy Ghost said, "Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them." So these two friends, cheerful Barnabas and eager Saul, started forth on the first definitely organized missionary tour.

One other event in the life of Barnabas completes the New Testament picture of this lovable man. He and Saul took with them on this first missionary journey a young man named John Mark, a cousin of Barnabas. (See Col. 4:10, Revised Version.)

Mark's mother, Mary, who owned the house in Jerusalem where the Christians met together to pray for Peter, as we saw in our last lesson, was the sister of either the mother or father of Barnabas. But for some reason or other this young man did not stay with the missionaries for the whole of their tour, but went back to Jerusalem. There has been a good deal of speculation as to why he did this. He may have been homesick, not being able to forget his comfortable room in his mother's Jerusalem home while going through the privations and dangers of his missionary journeyings. At any rate he went back. We learn from a passage further on that Saul was greatly incensed by this temporary failure of young John Mark to stick to his task. When he and Barnabas started out for their second tour Barnabas wanted to give John Mark another chance to make good. Here we see a cheerful, kindly, forgiving man with sufficient force of character to contend vigorously for what he believed to be the kind and right thing to do. Barnabas insisted that Mark be given another chance; Paul refused. So Barnabas took Mark and went with him through the cities of Cyprus, while Paul chose Silas and started in another direction.

I think we all feel that we would give a good deal for a chance to get acquainted with Barnabas and shake his hand. He is just the right sort of a Christian for our day as he was for that earlier time. We would like to have him doing for our churches at Minneapolis and Denver and Dubuque and Rochester and Hartford—and Hicksville and Connor's Crossing and Locust Valley—what he did for the church at Antioch and for the churches he visited on his tour. Barnabas can't come back; but Here's an idea! Let's all try to be for our churches what Barnabas was for the churches of long ago. Let's try to treat folks the way Barnabas treated them, and be the kind of a Christian he was.

This is a lesson in which a map is indispensable. Notice that the beginning of the lesson, Acts 11: 19, takes us back to the time immediately following the martyrdom of Stephen. You remember that the Christians were scattered by the heavy persecutions at this time (Acts 8:). Our lesson follows the line of the fleeing Christians who went north from Jerusalem. Phœnicia lies just north of Palestine. Some of these Christian itinerants took ship and went to the island of Cyprus, one of the two big islands in the eastern half of the Mediterranean. Others kept on north and reached the great city of Antioch. This Antioch must be distinguished from Antioch in Pisidia, which Barnabas and Saul reached in their first journey (Acts 13 4). A most interesting task to be assigned to a pupil with a taste for history would be to prepare a brief sketch of the city of Antioch. Its history is full of romance. Founded B.C. 300, it still exists as the little city of about six thousand inhabitants, and is now called Antakieh. At the time of this lesson it was a princely city, the third in importance in the Roman empire, coming next after Rome itself and Alexandria. It was called "Antioch the Beautiful," "the Crown of the East." Its temple of Jupiter was burnished with gold. Its palace, the senate house, the theater, the amphitheater, were of splendid magnificence. But its people were given over to sensuality and moral degradation. During the first few centuries of the Christian era, however, Christianity made a profound impression upon it. Ignatius, bishop and martyr, lived there in the second century, and Chrysostom, the golden-mouthed preacher, delivered his sermons there during the fourth century. Try to find Henry Van Dyke's rare story, "The Lost Word." This gives vivid pictures of life in Antioch and the wonderful influence upon it of the preaching of Chrysostom. The story is found in the volume of Dr. Van Dyke's work entitled "The Blue Flower." Antioch became one of the most powerful centers of Christianity. No less than ten church councils were held in this city, and its "patriarch" for a time had precedence over those of Rome, Constantinople, Jerusalem and Alexandria.

When Barnabas and Saul went forth on their missionary journey, they first visited Seleucia, a coast city, west of Antioch, and then went from end to end of the island of Cyprus, where Barnabas's old home was located. It is interesting to note the striking corroboration by secular history and archeology of the New Testament record here. Sergius Paulus is referred to by Pliny as having written a book on Cyprus, and in a later century a Greek slab was discovered containing the name of Paulus as proconsul. Then a Roman inscription of the time of Claudius contains the name of Sergius Paulus.

Sergius Paulus was much wiser than the island ruler of whom Browning tells in his wonderful poem-letter "Cleon." This Roman official, groping around for truth in the mazes of Greek and Roman philosophy and mythology, did not take pains to go down to the shore and talk with the wandering Jewish preacher Paul who had with his company touched at his isle. Sergius Paulus took the trouble to investigate the new Gospel, and found it was true. One of the conjectures as to why Paul changed his name from Saul to Paul is that he wished to honor this sympathetic friend, who was one of his first converts.

It's too bad that this happy story of good cheer and triumph has to be marred by the picture of a churl. Elymas, the wise man of the island, did not like the idea of having the ruler and others accept an alien faith. He was not seeking truth but was watching out not to lose his job as teacher and spiritual adviser in the island. So because he would not look for truth and even dared to attack the truth for the sake of his selfish ambition he was punished by losing his eyesight temporarily. It is a pitiful picture, the once wise man, suddenly struck blind, "seeking some to lead him by the hand." Both Paul and Elymas were shocked into temporary blindness by a vision of the truth. Saul yielded; Elymas rebelled. We may hope that even he a little later bowed his will to the truth and received not only his old power of vision, but a new grace in his heart.

Lesson Thoughts for Boys

By Louis E. Orcutt

WHAT boy is there who is not proud of the name of his school or his team or his gang, proud to be known as one of those permitted to be called by that name? What boy is there who, having worked with the rest to train for some trial of strength on track or diamond, does not await the coach's placing of the men with quicker breath, lest he should be left out? What boy or man is there who has not stood before the bulletin board and has not thrown back his shoulders and has not vowed to do his best as he read his name among the contestants for some interschool event? It is fundamental in our makeup to want to be chosen for the hard task that must be done. In this lesson we learn of a group of people who had followed Jesus the Christ until his spirit had so marked their lives that they were like him, and outsiders noting their lives called them Christians—those who are of Christ. In this body of brethren called Christians there were two who were set apart for a hard race and a heavy task. On Barnabas and Saul the Holy Spirit laid the duty of preaching Christ to the Gentiles, and the other believers in Antioch were not jealous that the Spirit had chosen these two; but they thanked God that he had chosen them, and prayed with them that their mission might succeed and that they might be brought safely to Antioch again. It is now many years since the believers were first called Christians in Antioch; but the Spirit still has tasks for strong men to do and he is still calling men to fulfil these tasks. Lead your boys to think of the ways in which it might be possible for them to be messengers of Christ to the Gentiles in the next street or town or over seas; and show them how well worth while it is to deserve the name of Christian.

Lesson Thoughts for Girls

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

A NEW family moved into a select little town, but though they wanted to make friends nobody called on them, and they were very lonely. Because I was sorry for them I spoke to a girl I knew—a girl who was a leader in the small social set.

"Why don't you call on the Smiths?" I asked.

"I don't know anything about the Smiths," the girl answered. "But no one else has called, and I don't want to be the first!"

Barnabas and Saul were the first Christian missionaries. What if they had said, "Why should we carry the word of the Lord to distant cities? There are others who might take the message. Why should we be first?"

Because Barnabas and Saul went out as missionaries the people of Asia began to understand the faith. It isn't always pleasant to be the first in a new field. The first missionaries were persecuted, but their great example made others follow them despite the persecution.

I have heard girls who wanted to do wonderful deeds grumble over little household tasks. On the first missionary journey Barnabas and Saul had John Mark, a young and probably rich man, as their attendant. Perhaps he ran errands for them, and made arrangements for their board and lodging, and carried their baggage. It was a menial position for a well-to-do man, but by serving in this way he was able to help Barnabas and Saul spread the Gospel. Some one has to do the homely tasks so that the more talented or capable people may have the time and courage to do the great ones.

An old woman once kept house for a great concert singer.

"If it wasn't for me," said the old woman, "he wouldn't sing so well."

"How do you help?" she was asked.

"I keep his house clean, and his meals warm, and his stockings darned," said the old woman. "If he wasn't comfortable he wouldn't be happy, and if he wasn't happy he couldn't sing like he does!"

The Devil Goes to Churcl

From The Sun Dial in the New York Evening Sun, by Don Marquis

DR. DAVID MELTON enjoyed a lucrative position as pastor of the church to which belonged Mr. Jefferson Higginbotham. Mr. Higginbotham was not only one of the wealthiest men in the Middle Western city where he lived, and which he dominated to a considerable extent, but one of the richest men in America and widely known for his philanthropies. One Sunday morning during the Lenten season Mr. Higginbotham proceeded up the aisle arm in arm with no less a person than the Devil himself, and they sat down side by side in the Higginbotham pew.

EVERY one in the church had seen the Devil with Mr. Higginbotham and had recognized him for what he was. But each person kept up the pretense before all the other members of the congregation that it was not the Devil at all, but merely some eccentric human friend of the great financier's. Some of them even claimed to know that he was a distant cousin of Mr. Higginbotham, who was, unfortunately, a bit off mentally, and who persisted in putting on strange costumes and going about in them. The story ran that the church service had a soothing effect upon this cousin's nervous malady, and that Mr. Higginbotham out of his boundless charity and good-will conducted him to church careless of what form public opinion might take. Mr. Higginbotham was much praised for his piety and his courage and his kindness in this matter. These traits, the congregation said, were characteristic of him.

And yet while the members of the congregation were telling this story to one another they knew well enough that it was really the Devil who was with Mr. Higginbotham.

BUT when the rest of the congregation had filed out and Dr. Melton and the Devil and Mr. Higginbotham were left together Dr. Melton made a protest.

"Mr. Higginbotham," he said, "I think this is going a bit too far. I have submitted to you in many ways with regard to the management of the church, and I do not think it either kind or politic that you should inflict upon me the bodily presence of this person. Mr. Higginbotham, you have cut me to the soul! There must be a limit to what even a clergyman is expected to countenance."

"Don't blame me," said the old man, raising his feeble arms and speaking in a thin, piping voice. "I'm as helpless in the matter as you are, Dr. Melton. He would come! What could I do?"

"But," objected Dr. Melton, scowling darkly at the Devil, whom, to do Dr. Melton justice, he had never liked, "but, Mr. Higginbotham, if you were strangers he would find no pleasure in your society, and would not insist on accompanying you."

"DR. MELTON," said the aged magnate a little angrily, "I resent your insinuation that this person associates with me because there is some spiritual affinity between us! But, indeed, if ere were any, whose fault would it b but your own? Are you not my spi ual mentor? Do I not employ you an pay you for moral guidance? And when ave I ever failed to rise to the heigh indicated by you? Dr. Melton, d ing ten years of acquaintance with me ave you not repeatedly, in public a in private, pointed out that I am th er-fect flower of a perfect system?"

"I have felt it my duty," sai Dr. Melton, "to hold you up as an id to the youth of the land. The public ust understand that our really great en are on the side of Christianity, la or-der and the stable interests of socie I do not say even now that I have p sed you too highly, Mr. Higginbot m. But I do feel that it is quite withi my rights to protest against your on-tinued association with this perso "

MR. HIGGINBOTHAM looked ed-itatively at the Devil. The vil was examining a stained-glass wi ow which depicted the Crucifixion, wi his head on one side and with all the ec-tation of an amateur artist.

"I'VE told you," said Mr. H in-botham, "that I'd like to get of him. But how can I? He's alwa in-truding—in a business way, you k ."

"Yes," said Dr. Melton, a little lly and dropping his more hortatory an-ner, "yes, quite so! I can under nd that. He would." Dr. Melton si ed. "You have your material problems Ir. Higginbotham, just as I have my ir-itual ones."

"And in order to reform the w l," said Mr. Higginbotham, "we must ve many great institutions which t a deal of money. Christianity costs ot, Dr. Melton, if it is run right."

"It does," said Dr. Melton. 'It does. I can understand how di ult your position is! I am sorry if ap-peared heated in my protest a mo ent ago. But the shock was great. . . Yes, I have always held that the n ey was sanctified by the use to whic is put."

"He says," said Mr. Higginbot m, indicating the Devil with his ny forefinger, "that he only inten to come in person once a year. . . . ne-where around Easter, he says. . . Really, Doctor, I think we'll ha to stand for it! He could wipe a my financial interests out with a wa of the hand, you know. Yes, we'll ave to stand for it."

"FOR the good of the church,' aid Dr. Melton, thinking how dly the church needed the money.

"For the good of the church,' aid Mr. Higginbotham.

They passed down the aisle tog her in complete brotherly accord once re, leaving the Devil in the church. He smiled.

"I KNEW," he said, "that I wo n't need to say anything. Th al-ways work around to the right po of view if you leave them alone!"

Correspondence of Professor David Smith, D.D.

A NUMBER of people have been disturbed by an energetic Plymouth Brother, who maintains that only "believers" should be admitted to the Lord's Table, basing his remarks largely on I Cor. 5, and that church membership is confined to the "saved," quoting Acts 2 : 47. The circle is kept pure by the expulsion of those whose doctrine and conduct are not such as the members approve of. Anxious.

IN theory the "Brother" is quite right, but his application is another matter. Assuredly it is only believers who are entitled to sit at the Lord's table. The very term "sacrament" implies this. It is the Latin sacramentum, the Roman soldier's oath of allegiance, which he swore on his enlistment and renewed every first of March, and which pledged him to fidelity to his country, his commander, and his comrades. By the very act of taking his place at the holy table the communicant publicly confesses his faith in Christ and proclaims his allegiance. And the church is "the communion of the faithful." No one belongs to it whose conduct gives the lie to his profession, and the situation at Corinth is a case in point.

In that stern chapter (I Cor. 5) the apostle is referring to a peculiarly aggravated immorality. But, unless in such flagrant cases, severity is worse than laxity, and one who glibly condemns his neighbors condemns himself. It is indeed true that church membership is confined to the "saved," but who are these? It is a significant fact that, wherever it occurs in the New Testament, the term is a present participle, and it should be rendered, not "those that are saved," but "those that are being saved" (compare Acts 2 : 47, R.V.). That is to say, salvation is the goal, and believers have not yet reached it; they are only on the way to it. They will surely reach it, since "He which hath begun a good work in them will perfect it until the day of Jesus Christ" (Phil. 1 : 6); but the work is theirs as well as his, and meantime they are "working out their own salvation with fear and trembling" (2 : 12), "not counting themselves yet to have apprehended, but pressing on toward the goal" (3 : 13, 14). They are "being saved"; they are treading the steep and narrow path that leadeth unto life eternal, and they encounter many a difficulty, and often stumble and fall, and sometimes wander from the path. The test is where, amid all our fainting, our desire lies, and whither, despite all our errors, our faces keep turning; and there is no surer condemnation of a man than a disposition to sit self-complacently by the wayside and pass judgment on his weak fellow mortals.

Inasmuch as it is Christ's table, it is as wide open as Christ's heart. An aged parishioner once told me a moving story. It was a Communion Sunday, and the pastor observed a poor woman, who was troubled by lack of "assurance," passing the cup untasted. He stepped down, took the cup, and handed it back to her. "Take it, woman, take it," he said; "it's for sinners."

DAVID SMITH.

GEORGE W DUNLAP, a missionary at Cebu, Philippine Islands, writes "Some time ago I left Cebu to make a visit to the Catabato valley of Mindanao where a number of our members from Cebu have gone to take up homesteads under the direction of the government. To make the different colonies I traveled by horseback, on foot, in small boats and riding carabao sometimes in water three feet deep. But I tell you it was worth it. In all I baptized thirty-eight adults and thirty-four children The people have suffered in many ways. Grasshoppers have destroyed parts of their rice, wild pigs have rooted up at night some of what had been planted by day, and crocodiles have eaten a few of their children, yet they all seem hopeful for a better future. In fact, things are very encouraging now. What a contrast between those Christians and the people of the hills! Spain never conquered this section of Mindanao and it is just in the last few years that any one's life was safe in it. Now there is very little danger if one takes reasonable precaution as to where he goes. This is the farthest I have been from civilization."

"Which store will give me greatest value?"

IT is the store that sells good merchandise at fair prices.

It is the store where you are waited on promptly.

It is the store where they do not make mistakes in charges, nor ask you to pay bills twice.

It is the store where you do not have to wait for change.

It is the store where the proprietor has time to see that things run smoothly.

Stores equipped with the up-to-date Cash Register give this valuable service.

Answers to Financial Queries

MRS. C. D. D., PENNSYLVANIA. Sapulpa Refining, Midwest Refining and United Western Oil, speculative possibilities while the war and high petroleum prices last, are far from an investment rating. Better put your money into good bonds.

D. E. L., MAINE. Gulf States Steel Company reports earnings for January of $112,473, and for February $127,721, which is at the rate of over 20 per cent. on the common, after allowing for the first and second preferred dividends. The first preferred stock may be considered as an attractive business man's investment.

S. C., MARYLAND. (1) We cannot find that there has been any recent sale of the shares of the Union Sulphur Company. The stock has been recently quoted as high as $8,000 per share. No statement of earnings is made public, though we are reliably informed that dividends of 100 per cent. a month have been paid for the last eight years. The company is said to be the largest producer of sulphur in the world.

N. T. O., OREGON. Lackawanna Coal and Lumber Company 6 per cent. bonds are quoted on a basis of 4 cents on the dollar, equivalent to $4 for a $1,000 bond. We hope the man responsible for getting your friend, an aged widow, to invest her $9,000 in these bonds will be punished by an accusing conscience. The bonds and stocks of this bankrupt concern never did have any standing as investment securities, and the man who sold them must have known their character.

P. S. S., VIRGINIA. American Beet Sugar Company reports the best earnings in its history. The common stock has just been placed on a 1½ per cent. quarterly basis, the directors declaring a dividend for the whole year of 6 per cent. It is believed the company's earnings are running at the rate of 20 per cent. on the common stock. The company's prosperity is due to the temporary high price of refined sugar. The present conditions cannot always last, and with the ending of the war the price of sugar will likely come back again to normal.

MISS C. W. H., IOWA. Erie Railroad for the eight months from July 1, 1915, to February 29, 1916, showed net earnings of $16,958,428, an increase of $8,516,737, equal to 100 per cent. The gross increased 20 per cent. While no dividends are paid on the preferred issues, the company earned for the year ended December 31, 1915, a surplus of $7,400,000, equivalent to 4 per cent. on each of the 4 per cent. preferred issues, and about 4.31 per cent. on the common stock. Neither of the preferred issues can receive more than 4 per cent. It is generally believed that Erie will pay a dividend on the preferred this year.

E. M. T., MASSACHUSETTS. Manhattan Railway Company second mortgage 4 per cent. gold bonds at 89, yielding 4.50 per cent., have an enormous equity back of them. $60,000,000 capital stock, now having a market value of $78,000,000, come after the bonds. Dividends of not less than 4 per cent. have been paid since 1889, and for the past 12 years the rate has been 7 per cent., making the total paid in dividends during the past twenty-seven years 165 per cent., or an average of over 6 per cent. These figures would seem to prove as true the contention of bankers that the income on the second mortgage 4s is assured for years and that the bonds are sound.

"SILVER DOLLAR," COLORADO. The present price of silver is 14 cents an ounce above quotations prevailing last September. Many predict that this is but the beginning of the rise, and that it may reach 75 cents or even $1 an ounce, basing their estimates on the fact that England and France are using unusually large quantities of silver to pay their soldiers in foreign territory and in consequence, other European nations are withholding gold from circulation, using silver in its stead. Almost every nation in the world is buying silver for coinage. History shows that silver has always maintained high prices during and following the big wars, because of the demand for subsidiary coins.

DR. M. C. McD, FLORIDA. You state that you have $4,000 to invest in sound stocks and bonds. You are elderly, in impaired health, and wholly dependent upon your efforts as a writer and the income from this money for your support. In our opinion, you should not buy anything that is speculative, but should put your money into sound non-speculative bonds, or perhaps preferred railroad shares, such as Baltimore and Ohio or Atchison, either of which may be obtained on a 5 per cent. income basis. But safer than the preferred stock would be good bonds—possibly the following:

		Yield.
Interborough Rapid Transit	5s	5.05 per cent.
Virginian Railway	5s	5.05 per cent.
N. Y. Telephone Gen. 4½		4.55 per cent.
Central Pacific Ry Ref.	4s	4.55 per cent.

REV. C. E. S., MARYLAND. Virginia Railway Company first mortgage 5 per cent. bonds are slowly but surely becoming better known as an investment issue. The road was built by Henry H. Rogers, of Standard Oil Company, and his estate owns practically all the outstanding $27,955,000 5 per cent. preferred stock and $31,271,500 common stock. The bonds come ahead of the stock and are a first lien on the entire property, including 470 miles at the rate of $62,766 per mile; and are additionally secured by deposit of entire capital stock and entire $3,000,000 first mortgage bonds of the Virginian Terminal Railway Company, which owns the big piers at Sewalls Point, Va. For the eight months ended February 29, 1916, the road earned 4.59 per cent. on the preferred, or an estimated annual rate of 6.93 per cent., compared with 1.79 per cent. for same period in the previous year, or an actual annual rate of 2.64 per cent.

THE AWAKENED LAYMEN

IT means something when a thousand to fifteen hundred men will spend the afternoons and evenings of four days in enthusiastic consideration and discussion of a business which, if it succeeds, will not only bring them no money, but will call for greater gifts. The New York City Convention of the Laymen's Missionary Movement in its sessions from April 9 to 12 presented just such a sight. Inspiring addresses brought spontaneous response from an appreciative audience. But when the program reached the practical questions of the stewardship of the church and of the individual member, the spiritual obligation of the laymen to the church and of the church to the world, when these discussions came and the questionaires followed, that audience of earnest men sprang to action with pertinent questions and helpful suggestions. These facts were emphasized: It is the business of the local church to push out into unworked fields; the church is a force and not a fold, and the missionary boards and the missionaries working under them are only the representatives of the local churches; the work of the local church must embrace and include evangelism, the training of men and women for Christian work, and their commissioning to definite service; and then the conducting of missions in which the cycle will begin again. The question was asked of the delegates, How many men has your church sent into definite Christian work this year?

Dr. Agar of the Baptist Five-Year Movement, who led the discussion on the financing of the church, said: "You and your money are one and the same thing. When God bought you, that included your money." He showed that it was the experience of the churches as a whole that only fifty per cent. of the members contributed anything to the church, and that two-thirds of the members contributed nothing to benevolences, and that with few exceptions these contributors included all of the regular attendants, and especially all who gave personal service. It was Mr. Agar's opinion that the church fair was of the devil, and in this opinion he was roundly applauded; and he thought that tithing was the only decent and orderly way for a Christian to meet his obligation and that the rule of a tithe of "time, talent and treasure" was a good beginning. He said that if we would raise the cost of church membership more people would be crowding to get in.

It was also emphasized that no envelop system would work itself, but that it must be supported by the every-member canvass, in which the spiritual element of giving was kept to the fore. The seventy conventions throughout the country, of which the New York Convention was one of the last, will be brought to a focus in the Laymen's Missionary Congress at Washington, April 26–30, which will be fully reported in the Christian Herld.

Light-Delivery Cars

$625 COMPLETE BENJAMIN BRISCOE HAS SOLVED THE LIGHT-DELIVERY PROBLEM FOR THOUSANDS OF RETAIL MERCHANTS

You know what the engineering genius of Benjamin Briscoe has done in the pleasure-car field. He has made it possible to secure a beautiful, economical and efficient car—a car that the whole family will be proud to ride in and that costs little to run—at a wonderfully low price.

Today, the Briscoe is undoubtedly the best-liked car in the country. And the big $6,000,000 plants at Jackson, Michigan, are working continually to supply the demand.

NOW—A Briscoe Delivery Car

Now, Benjamin Briscoe has turned his construction skill to the commercial vehicle field.

He has seen the need of the merchant, whose business demands a real light-delivery wagon—not a heavy truck cut down, costly to operate and unsuited to its work.

Efficient delivery today is half the battle of getting and holding trade. The delivery wagon is the messenger by which the store is judged. The housewife likes to see a stylish vehicle driving up to the door—she likes the speed with which her orders can be and are filled.

The merchant with motor-delivery has a big lead over competition—provided his delivery service is economical, as well as efficient.

The Briscoe Solves the Problem

The Briscoe light-delivery car meets your every need. Like every Briscoe product, it is good-looking—it is a real asset to the store. Everybody in your community will notice this car, and your facilities for promptly meeting their needs.

It's economical—We have obtained thirty miles and more per gallon with the motor—and every part is as sturdily built as skill can make it.

It is roomy—there is exceptional load space, and the body is so designed as to put the least possible strain on the chassis.

It gives you clean, efficient, speedy motor-delivery at a first cost and upkeep cost that makes it poor business to keep on using horses.

A Monkey Wrench Boomerang

DAN DANIELSON'S grocery store was in the midst of the usual Saturday morning rush. Hank Kissell was back of the counter tying up a dollar's worth of "A" sugar; Pat Donlon, in the center of the floor, was gently removing the top of an egg crate, and Danielson was answering his sixth 'phone call in five minutes and was assuring Mrs. Allen that her order would be sent up at once.

"Yes, we have it: one cake of yeast, half dozen eggs, sack o' flour, pound o' butter, bottle vanilla—yes, I got that down. Yes, the order is all ready. Yes, the boy will leave with it right away. Yes, right away. No, there won't be any delay. Certainly; we are hurrying it all we can. Yes. At once." He banged the receiver on the hook and turned to Kissell.

"Got Mrs. Allen's order ready, Hank?"

"All but the yeast cake. Wagon hasn't been here yet."

"But that order's got to go, Hank."

"Well, we can't send yeast we ain't got. You know what happened the day we sent her a old cake."

The sounds of wheels outside drowned Danielson's assent, and the driver of the yeast wagon rushed in.

"Just in time, Gus," said Hank. "Our biggest customer has been waitin' half an hour fur one o' them yeast cakes. You just saved our lives."

"Yah, und nearly lost my own yet. The creek is that high, already, I must go three miles north to the corners to come across. Long Bridge is all vashed out, yonce."

"Well, I guess once is enough."

"I tink it iss one too many. Yah!" said Gus as he left his package on the counter and rushed out and into his seat on the wagon.

"That accounts for the new boy bein' late," said Danielson.

"New boy? Have you hired one?" Kissell usually knew what was being done, and in his surprise he took two extra and wholly unnecessary turns of the string around the package he was doing up.

"Yes. Widow Dill's boy Jake. She heard I wanted a boy, and drove all the way in town after ten o'clock last night. Store was closed and she came up to the house. Had Jake with her, too. Liked the boy anyhow, and I thought a boy with a mother like that ought to be a good worker."

"Whoopee! Wow!"

"S'matter, Pat? Pinched your finger?" asked Hank.

"Naw; my intellek. Jake Dill. Dill pickle. We'll call him Pickle fur short. Get it?"

Hank and Danielson got it, and were just well started on a hearty laugh when the door opened with a very businesslike creak, and the new boy entered.

He walked up to Mr. Danielson, his cap in the crook of his left elbow, and waited respectfully for the merchant to overcome his merriment. Danielson quickly recovered his poise, and held up his hand as Jake began to tell the reason for his tardiness.

"We know all about it, Jacob. Long Bridge is out; that's excuse enough. Do you know where Mrs. Allen, banker Allen, lives?"

Jacob did, and Mrs. Allen's order was soon on its way.

IT was a busy day for Jacob, and he was heartily glad when closing time came. When he returned from his first delivery, Mr. Danielson showed him a memorandum of his day's duties, which were scheduled to begin at 6:30 and to end when he swept out the store after closing. His instruction in the art of sweeping out was intrusted to Pat, who, in this first moment of comparative leisure, apprised Jake that so far as he, Pat, was concerned, he, Jake, was to be known thenceforth as "Pickle." With four older brothers at home, a little matter of a new nickname did not worry Jacob. The nickname was really almost welcome to him, and made him feel somehow as if he "belonged" already. He noticed that Pat's method of sweeping out ignored the corners and all the dark places, and was calculated to reach a whirlwind finish in the shortest possible space of time.

The next morning about ten o'clock Pat called Pickle and sent him down cellar to draw a gallon of molasses. Jake had never seen molasses flow so slowly. The great brown gobs of viscosity formed deliberately and dropped into the jug reluctantly. At last Jake got tired. He went to the top of the stairs and asked Pat if there wasn't some way to make that molasses flow faster.

"Sure," said Pat. "You want to use the molasses wrench. Didn't you see it down there?"

Jake hadn't seen it, so Pat hurried down stairs and searched the neighborhood of the cask, but without avail. No wrench was to be found.

"Funny, Pickle," he said. "It ought to be here. Guess you'll have to go over to Snyder's and borrow his. I'll look after this jug. Get your hat and I'll ask Mr. Danielson to write you a note."

A few minutes later Mr. Snyder was reading a memorandum in Dan Danielson's handwriting. It read, "Please deliver to bearer one molasses wrench." He looked at the intense, earnest face of the boy and scented the joke. He said: "Yes, yes. Just a moment," and went briskly down cellar only to reappear shortly, empty-handed

"Sorry, young man," he said, "but I can't seem to put my hands on that implement. Better try Carrig's in the next block."

Jake tried Carrig's, and he tried Meyers', and all the rest of the five or six grocery stores in the town, and the last one sent him to Perkins's hardware store. Perkins was standing near the front of the store, and he read the much-perused note, and smiled kindly at the messenger.

"I think I can fix you up, son," he said. "Wait until I look at the stock book."

He went back to his little private office and showed the note to his bookkeeper. "What have we got in stock, John," he asked, "that we can let Danielson have for this?" John looked the note over carefully.

"How about that patent spigot that forces the liquid to flow and measures it at the same time? I saw Danielson looking at it the other day."

"Oh, yes; that one I ordered for Brown just before he sold out. Say, was Dan Danielson looking at that? He was in here when Brown ordered it, and he said Brown would go broke buying new-fangled machinery. Dan is more liable to go broke trying to get along without it; but here's where he gets a good start."

A FEW minutes later Pickle left with the "molasses wrench" and a bill for $3.50, and returned to the store in full confidence that he had successfully performed his first difficult errand.

Danielson was busy with a customer when Jake entered. Jake stood, cap in hand, until the customer had picked up her bundles, and then said:

"Here is the 'molasses wrench,' Mr. Danielson."

"Molasses wrench, what molasses wrench?" said Danielson, who had for the moment forgotten the errand Pat had fixed up for "Pickle." Then he took the bill and opened it, and saw himself charged with one patent liquid meter at $3.50. He flushed and his mouth puckered into a whistle.

"Who sent you to Perkins?" he asked.

"I don't just remember, sir," Jake replied. "I went to all the grocery stores first and they didn't any of them have one and then they sent me to Perkins and he had just this one left."

"Let's see it," Danielson demanded.

He took it, unwrapped it and held it in front of him. He turned the crank and watched the indicator travel around the dial, while Pat and Hank and "Pickle" looked on silently and breathlessly. Bill Oliver, the village gossip, sauntered in and helped watch.

"What you got there, Dan?" he questioned having restrained himself beyond his usual wont.

"Nice little machine for savin' valuable time, Bill. Here, Pat, take it down cellar and see if it works."

DETROIT VAPOR STOVES
"Work Like Gas"

BURN OIL AND GASOLINE

"YES, I always have 'good luck' on baking day" says the proud possessor of a Detroit Vapor Stove. "The oven bakes to perfection, and in cooking I simply light the burners and put the kettles on at once, just like a city Gas Stove.

"DETROIT VAPOR STOVES have no wicks, asbestos rings, or anything like a wick to burn out or replace. There are no pipes to connect. You can place the stove in any part of the kitchen, and it is ready to use at once. The patented giant burners are wonders. They are sparing in fuel consumption and absolutely safe. The entire cost of running is less than one cent an hour per burner—cheaper than wood or coal. You can use this stove the year round."

DELAY IS AN ENEMY

We know that not one-half of our readers who wish and tend to enter the Contest are now competing. Why are all of them busily reaping its many benefits and untold piness? Because, we fear, they are permitting themse to lag, they are allowing the old enemy, procrastination conquer them again.

What a tyrannical habit that can become—the habit of ting-it-off, of saying "Tomorrow"! How oppressively it smother our active impulses, and forever keep us f achieving victory in anything and everything we may template entering!

Today Is Golden

Tomorrow is silver; the rest is lead. That is an ancient ing, which holds today, for you. Start the Bible Picture test right now—this minute! You can do so by securing Outfit free, or by securing it in connection with your own scription.

Your Free Contest Outfit

At the beginning of the left-hand column on this page will notice our first special offer—an Outfit free to any scriber who secures a new eight months' subscription, sen us one dollar. Why don't you take advantage of that ge ous offer, and thus you will not have to renew or extend own subscription, in order to secure an Outfit. Of course will want to continue taking the Christian Herald, but it be that you are now paid well in advance, and do not de at this time to further extend your subscription. Yet wish to secure an Outfit. Do that—this offer was made the needs of just such subscribers in mind!

You May Make Gifts

"May I present the eight months' subscription to a fri who will be a new subscriber, and yet secure the Outfit self?" a subscriber asks: and "I have a neighbor who wo like the Christian Herald for eight months," another wri "but she can only afford fifty cents of the one dollar pr May I add on the other fifty cents, so that she may se the Christian Herald, and yet receive an Outfit for obtai the subscription?" Yes, we see no reason why such g aids and agreements should not take place.

An Outfit to the New Subscriber

Of course (see second offer to the left), the new subscr will also receive an Outfit if fifty cents more is sent in with eight months' subscription—$1.50 in all.

There Are Other Offers

Read all the offers given to the left—one of them will fit mood and your case. But, above all, stop delaying; s competing. Take action today, and tomorrow and many ot days may be much happier for your decision!

Of Course You May Win

The Contest consists only of choosing, from a selected lis about 2,000 short Bible verses, those that make the names for a series of 60 pictures—those that describe best action or scene shown by the pictures. You can do that, do it well. You need no Bible knowledge to win—sim common sense judgment in selecting the most fitting ver Yet you will pleasantly learn much of the Bible in the C test. It will benefit you in many ways.

There Are Large Cash Awards

Those excelling will be presented 419 cash awards, aggreg ing $3,500 in cash. The first award is $1,250; second, $6 third, $350. And so on. These lend a zest to the absorb competition. Surely there is a place for you in such a long l

KY-AN-IZE

Floor Finish

Here's what the Painter used in doing over our floors. I asked him what it was that made such a beautiful, hard, glossy surface.

Said he, "It's Kyanize Floor Finish. I use it for all my inside jobs. It stands any kind of wear on floors, stairs and woodwork."

Then, thought I, what's good for floors must be good for furniture. I found out I could get Kyanize Floor Finish in eight beautiful and useful colors. It's surprising what results one can get in doing over any kind of furniture in the house—that needs to be made like new.

So now my house is a Kyanize House—every stick of woodwork in it fresh and always like new.

There's a lot of white woodwork, metal and plaster, too. Kyanize takes care of that. I had the bathroom, the kitchen, the white doors, the porch and lots of bedroom work done—including chairs, bureaus, tables and bedsteads—with Kyanize White Enamel.

I was surprised and pleased when our Painter gave me the estimate. Although it costs a little more than ordinary white enamel, Kyanize covers nearly double the surface—and is much easier applied. So really it's more economical.

It is white as marble—and just as hard.

It's easily kept clean and spotless with a damp cloth. So frequent repainting is unnecessary.

There's a Kyanize Agent in your neighborhood. If you do not know him—write us. We will gladly give you his name and address.

Merry Moments

MANY subscribers have responded to the little paragraph which we have twice printed at the head of the Merry Moments column. Perhaps we did not make ourselves quite clear, but we do not want clippings or copies of anecdotes already published, as we have abundant opportunity to clip humor from other papers. We hoped that our readers might know of funny incidents, the story of which had not been told, and some of these have come to us. We would like more. For such only can we pay.

CAUGHT ON THE FIRST BOUNCE. A commercial traveler was calling upon a grocer the other day when a poor old woman entered soliciting alms. The grocer, wishing to play a joke on the traveler, told the woman "to ask the master," at the same time pointing to the salesman. The traveler was thunderstruck for the moment, but regained his self-possession at once and said to the grocer, who was a very small man: "Boy, give this poor woman a quarter out of the till." The grocer paid.

NOT A JELLY ROLL.—A sick little girl was ministered to by her aunt, who administered a pill. In order to have her swallow it easily, she covered the pill with jelly. The little one swallowed the jelly and taking the pill from her mouth said, "Auntie, here's the seed."

AN EXTRA JOLT.—The Smith family, who resided in an interior city, had one of those maids of the invariably heavy hand. Not long ago the town experienced a slight shock of earthquake. Pictures were thrown down, furniture and crockery rattled about. During the tumult the mistress went to the head of the basement-stairs and called out in a patient, forbearing tone: "Well, Lizzie, what are you doing now?"—Harper's Magazine.

SO HE DIDN'T WASTE IT. A little boy went to Sunday school for the first time. His mother gave him a nickel to put in the collection box. When he returned, he had a sack of candy.

"Where did you get the candy?" asked his mother.

"From the stand around the corner."

"But what did you buy it with?"

"With the nickel you gave me."

"But that was for Sunday school!"

"Well," replied the boy, "I didn't need it. The minister met me at the door and got me in free."

THE WATER CURE.—A Swedish farmer who lived in Minnesota was taken ill, and his wife telephoned to the doctor.

"If you have a thermometer," answered the physician, "take his temperature. I will be out and see him presently."

An hour or so later when the doctor drove up the woman met him at the door.

"How is he?" asked the doctor.

"Vell," said she, "I ban put the barometer on him like you tell me, and it say 'Very dry,' so I give him a pitcher of water to drink, and now he ban gone back to work."—Exchange.

NOT THE METRIC SYSTEM.—Little Lucile, aged five, was talking to a gentleman; when she became impudent, her mother took her out of the room to punish her. She could find nothing but the yardstick, so she whipped her with that. A little later Lucile came back in the room and the gentleman asked her what her mother had done to her. She said: "Mama just measured me all over."

IN THE LINE OF INHERITANCE.—Little Sam came to school one morning with fear written all over his face. His teacher took him to one side, and asked about the trouble.

"My boy, what is the matter?" the teacher asked.

"Well," he replied, "Paw he's got a new pair of false teeth and I am afraid he is going to have his old ones cut down to fit me," he said as he burst into tears.—The Christian Courier.

ENCYCLOPEDIA IN TWO VOLUMES.—"My father and I know everything in the world," said a small boy to his companion.

"All right," said the latter. "Where is Asia?"

It was a stiff question, but the little fellow answered coolly.

"That is one of the questions my father knows."—Western Christian Advocate.

REV. FRED P. HAGGARD sailed from New York on April 6, to take charge of the Y. M. C. A. work in Russia for prisoners of war. Permission to engage in this work was given by the Russian government on condition that similar permission should be granted by Austria and Germany. The condition was easily met.

THE Third Annual Rural-Life Conference in Minnesota will be held at University Farm, St. Paul, July 25 to 28. Much of the time of the session will be devoted to discussing a survey of churches and social conditions in Minnesota. The Rural-Life Conference will be open to ministers of all denominations, teachers and community workers.

Questions and Answers

MISS L. B F., Louisa, Va. Please explain Phil. 2 : 13. Acts 5 : 31: Acts 11 : 18; Acts 20 : 21; Joel. 2 : 12-15; Judges 10 : 16. Is it possible for one give up a sin and repent in his own rength? Can he repent with godly rrow without the aid of the Holy Spirit?

T selection of these references and the wor ng of your question show you to be a ar l student of the Scriptures. Many peo are hindered in their efforts toward repentance by interpreting such passages as thes o mean that we must wait for God to do something special and unusual for us before we begin to repent. If one feels any sort of desire or leaning toward any spiritual gift or attainment there is no need to wait for God. t is He who prompts and begins the movement toward himself. When a man feels that he would like to repent he has actually begun o repent. He regrets his sin, he would like o end. God has already touched his heal The New Testament passages you mention bring out these facts: God helps us to repe ; he leads us to repent; he gives us the opportunity to repent. The Old Testament passages you note speak of God's repenting or being grieved. The people are urged to be ent e and sincere in their own repentance, and e told that God regrets their afflictions. The Scriptures are full of the truth that God suffers with the sufferings of humanity. The ourenth verse of the passage in Joel expres the hope that if the repentance of the peop is sincere enough God will change his plan f punishment to one of blessing. This i precisely what takes place in every instance f repentance. If the sinner does not repent e st meet disaster; if he does repent the isa r will be averted. Nowhere in the Bible i the act of God's grief over the sufferings of mankind, whether merited by sin or not, more graphically stated than in the verse you have oun in Judges: "His soul was grieved for he sery of Israel."

, Bronson, Kan. 1. The Latin of late's question to Jesus, "What Is ith?" is "Quid est veritas?" I have d somewhere that a slight change in e letters of these words would have ken the answer: "The man who stands re is truth." How is this change made? What is the meaning of "INRI" seen so many pictures of the cross? 3. hat Is the meaning of the letters S. P. R., which appeared on the banners the Roman legions?

1. e have never heard of the variation you n n; but the addition of the letter "a" ou give the sense you speak of: "Qui adest erit"—the one who is here is truth. Or rely transposing the letters we get: Vi st qui adest," or "E: vir qui adest," he man who stands here. 2. "Iesus az nus Rex Iudaeorum," Jesus the Nazen King of the Jews. 3. F. I. P., Hiawatha, Kan. The question u s is one that is on the lips of millions C stians today: "Why does God permit e ughter of millions of human beings?" he ations fail to recognize his sovereignty, hey disobey his law and seek after thier sts, whether it be for the sake of comer conquest, or revenge, the restraining flu e of the Holy Spirit is withdrawn, and ey e left to follo their own sinful devices. e ve seen what das happened in Europe. It nceivable that, if the rulers and cabits d councils of these nations had obeyed ine law, they would have been shedding ch ther's blood today and laying half e rld in ashes? Would they not have sought methods of conciliation and peace rather than war and blood and destruction? They sowed the wind and are now reaping the whirlwind.

L. C., Scottdale, Pa. The passage in 1 Cor. 5 : 5 refers to the excommunication of persistent and unrepentant sinners. It was an act of spiritual purgation by the church. Instances are found in Acts 5 : 1-11; 1 Tim. 1 : 20. With the withdrawal of the Holy Spirit's protecting power from such a one, he was left to the will of Satan, not necessarily forever, but for the affliction of the body—a chastening experience that would result beneficially in the end. (See 1 Cor. 11 : 32.)

W. M. K., Buxton, Iowa. Easter is celebrated in commemoration of the resurrection of Christ. It comes at nearly the same time as the Jewish passover, and was probably the first Christian festival to be established. Many curious customs are connected with the observance of Easter, which have nothing to do with its religious meaning. The reason for this is that a pagan festival was celebrated at the same season of the year and some of the pagan observances continued under Christianity. The name "Easter" itself is a survival of Anglo Saxon mythology. The following books give information concerning the popular customs, such as sending colored eggs: Brand's "Popular Antiquities," Hone's "Every Day Book," Chamber's "Book of Days."

G. D. D., Hampton, N. H. We have no information on the subject.

Student, Iowa. Write to the State Department, Washington, D. C., for the desired information.

J. E. T., Norfolk, Va. The title "apostle" is used in the New Testament as a general appellation for ministers of the Gospel who were "sent by God" (in a special sense) to preach the Word. In Luke 10 : 1-17, the seventy disciples are called "apostles," and even Mary Magdalene was said to become an apostle to the apostles themselves. In Rom. 16 : 7, Andronicus and Junia are referred to as being of "note among the apostles," although this probably meant nothing more than that the apostles knew and esteemed them. In II Cor., 8, we have the phrase, "messengers of the churches," which some have taken to mean "apostles." It would be a mistake to imply that the term was loosely used in the early church. It was really applied to a very small class of men who were regarded as having been divinely commissioned to spread the Gospel and upbuild the churches.

S. K. D., Chicago, Ill. Better consult a good physician.

A. R., Ohio. The folk dances and similar exercises taught in the public schools are given with the view of teaching grace and aiding in physical development. It is an open question, however, whether they do not lay the foundation for a love of the dance later in life.

Christian Herald Subscriber, Kan. In the case you describe it seems to us that no other confession is necessary than what has already been made. Full confession to others is only required when there has been a definite personal injury. Confession should then be made to the person or persons wronged and full restitution made so far as possible. Where a sin involves a matter simply between the soul and God there is no need to confess to any one but God. It is a help, however, to make a general confession before one's fellow Christians, as was done in the case you mention. And there is also great mental relief in talking freely and fully about these matters with some trusted spiritual adviser. We must not get the idea in thinking about confession that God likes to torment and humiliate us. There is no spiritual value in the mere pain and embarrassment that accompany confession. It is all a matter of helpfulness. God wants to get us in the best, cleanest, freest and happiest condition for helping others. We should not brood over the past, but claim God's full and free forgiveness for all our sins, his cleansing and keeping power for the present, and then forget ourselves in hard, earnest work for others.

L. P. H., Wallaceburg, Ont. Please explain "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force" (Matt. 11 : 12).

People who get things from God are those of determined and persistent faith. We are too ready to give up in our praying and to slacken our faith. This does not mean that God is unwilling to give us a blessing unless we persistently ask him for it, but that the persistence and determination give us a capacity for the blessing. Many things we ask for we are not ready to receive. We pray for an opportunity to deliver a message for God when we may not yet have learned the message; we pray for work for which we have not the required experience; we pray for some special boon that we learn later would have been a sorrow and hindrance rather than a joy and help. But the one who keeps on praying, who will not give up, who insists that God's will be wrought out in his life—that soul gains the experience and the capacity for God's best and biggest gifts. Remember that God always gives us what we ask—or something better. Paul persisted in praying for the removal of the thorn and was denied, though he got superabounding grace that was a richer blessing than freedom from the thorn. Those have the greatest claim to the fulfilment of this promise who pray for others rather than for themselves. If it is our passion and longing to help others for Jesus' sake, the way will open and the opportunity will be put into our hands.

M. D., Chamois, Mo. How had the Jewish religion become known in Ethiopia, as it must have been from the fact that the Ethiopian eunuch went to Jerusalem to worship and was familiar with the prophecy of Isaiah (Acts 8 : 30)?

There was almost from the beginning a tendency of the Jews to win people of other races to accept Judaism. This spirit grew stronger in the later history of the people, and when the nation was broken up and scattered by the conquest of Nebuchadnezzar, many of the Jews became practical missionaries, winning Gentiles to the faith. These Gentile converts became circumcised and were called "proselytes," and this work was called "proselytizing." We can not tell when the first Jews entered Ethiopia, but they had evidently been there, and the Ethiopian eunuch was probably a "proselyte of the gate," that is, a convert to the Jewish faith and to many Jewish forms of worship, but not an actual member of the Jewish congregation. The Standard Bible Dictionary states: "That large numbers of Gentiles, some of them persons of influence, accepted Judaism either wholly or in part is evidenced not only by Josephus and the New Testament, but also by contemporary poets and historians (Horace, Juvenal, Dion, Cassius), and by burial inscriptions."

Geo. T. S., Nucla, Colo. There are sixteen statues in the group referred to in the Congressional Library at Washington, instead of twelve as stated previously. The statues are as follows: representing Religion, Moses and St Paul; Commerce, Columbus and Robert Fulton; History, Herodotus and Gibbon; Art, Michael Angelo and Beethoven; Philosophy, Plato and Lord Bacon; Poetry, Homer and Shakespeare; Law, Solon and Chancellor Kent; Science, Newton and Joseph Henry.

R. G. H., Kanwood, Calif., adds to a recent statement in the Mail-Bag concerning the presence of the Allies at Salonica, which, he explains, is a treaty port to which Serbia had right of access, and the Allied powers, coming as allies of Serbia, were therefore not violating neutrality. This may be technically true; yet it evidently was not the view of the Greek sovereign or people. Such an explanation has never been hinted at by King Constantine in his recent deliverances on the subject.

Mrs J. R., Kirksville, N. Y. We know nothing about the controversy referred to in your letter, but we think it opportune to remark that a writer who claims that the martyrs of the first century A.D. were Catholics misunderstands history. There was no Catholic church in existence at that time, nor for generations afterward.

Sniffing the Smoke of Battle

THE President has again gone before a joint session of Congress to lay before the people's representatives for ir information facts of another stic move in the diplomatic game ch has so long been under way ween the President and the German ernment. The occasion was the atching of what the President hes the country to regard as the l note to Germany on the submarine warfare stion. The note was sent on April 18 by Secretary State Lansing to Ambassador Gerard at Berlin. announcement that it had been sent, and its port, was made by the President in person to the mbled senators and representatives at 1 o'clock he afternoon of April 19.

he historic session was held in the Hall of the se. Every seat on the was occupied and the ries were thronged, and presence there of many htly attired ladies gave one gay note to what was aps as somber a session Congress has ever held. President spoke from the ker's desk, and before were gathered first the tors and behind them the sentatives. Immediately about the steps and orm were seated members of the Cabinet and other als of the government; here in the hall were y representatives of foreign nations, though it is d that there were none Teutonic powers, while of their enemies were erous. The President orted to the Speaker's by Secretary Tumulty, mittee from the Senate ouse, and secret service and immediately upon rival began to read his ully prepared paper. e was intense silence ghout the reading and tmosphere of exceeding ty pervaded the assem- The applause that fol- upon the close was nte to the head of the n, and did not indicate impression was made by ldress itself.

mediately after the ad- the Senate and the House assembled in regular n and took up routine business, as there was no asked or at the moment possible upon the ge itself.

ders in Congress were taken by surprise when President announced his intention to appear Congress on the issue with Germany. On the on of the clash between the Executive and the ative branches of the national government over med merchantman issue, back in March, it was stood that the President then gave the leaders h Houses the assurance that he would take no which might bring the country face to face with ithout prior consultation with the Committees reign Relations of the two chambers. The ration of the note of April 18 was said to have guarded with the utmost secrecy, and the com- document was laid before the Cabinet on the ng of April 18. On the same day a conference eld between the President, Chairman Stone of enate Committee on Foreign Relations, and man Flood of the House Committee, as to the session which the President had summoned. ction by the President was also shrouded in , until his intention was made known with a ng suddenness to the two Houses on the eve of sion itself, which followed the conference with mmittee leaders and was in the form of a mes- livered by Secretary Tumulty, who was himself re of the purpose of the joint session. The ent's request for the joint session was promptly the subject of a resolution in both the House e Senate and adopted without debate or opposi- lthough to the moment that the clerk in each nnounced the subject a majority of the legisla- ere without information as to the President's d wholly without information as to his purpose.

It is stated that the momentous character of the President's action immediately impressed senators and representatives, and that the address was looked forward to as most likely to bring to an acute crisis the relations between the American and the German governments.

On the whole, up to the time the Christian Herald goes to press, the press of the country is inclined to view the note of April 18 as an ultimatum to Germany. No positive views of Congressmen have been published. While the tone of a portion of the press is unhappily belligerent, it is not to be forgotten that Congress put itself on record as opposed to the idea of America entering the war on the issue of the rights of Americans to sail upon belligerent owned vessels subject to attack by German submarines. Nothing has transpired since then to change this opinion, and it is unmistakable that the American people at large have no sympathy with those who insist upon exercising that particular right. Congressmen, in their speeches on the McLemore and the Gore resolutions in connection with the armed merchantman issue, and the newspapers and periodicals, reflected the consensus of public opinion as opposed to war over this question. The small minority of what is in reality a special class who would welcome the entrance of America into the war on the side of the Allies have thus far been able to obtain a wider and louder expression of their views than have the great masses of the American people, who see no occasion for war. Consequently there is an apparent backing up of the President in his latest move, regardless of the unfortunate fact that, contrary to the will and wish of the people and to the spirit of the Constitution, he has placed upon Congress the gigantic task not of declaring war, but of averting war. Should the view prevail in Germany that the President's note is an ultimatum, and should the German government see no possible way of acceding to the President's demands, a severance of diplomatic relations is inevitable by reason of the President's declaration.

At the joint session of Congress on April 19 this sole war-making department of our government learned for the first time of the acute crisis which had been reached in our diplomatic negotiations with Germany. It cannot be safely prophesied what Congress will do in the event the German government does not "immediately declare and effect an abandonment of its present methods of submarine warfare against passenger and freight carrying vessels." It can only be recorded at this time as a part of the news of this extreme action by the President and the extremely grave situation, that both Congress and the American people have up to this point been overwhelmingly against going to war over this issue.

Text of the President's Address

(IN all essential particulars the President's Address and the note to Germany were identical. In many portions the language was identical. The tone of the note was naturally more formal, and the sequence of statements does not follow exactly the same sequence as in the Address. But to all intents and purposes to read the Address is also to read the note to Germany, particularly by including the excerpts from the note which will be found interpolated in italics at different places in the following full text of the President's Address.)

Gentlemen of the Congress:

A situation has arisen in the foreign relations of the country of which it is my plain duty to inform you very frankly.

It will be recalled that in February, 1915, the Imperial German Government announced its intention to treat the waters surrounding Great Britain and Ireland as embraced within the seat of war, and to destroy all merchant ships owned by its enemies that might be found within any part of that portion of the high seas, and that it warned all vessels, of neutral as well as of belligerent ownership, to keep out of the waters it had thus proscribed, or else enter them at their peril. The Government of the United States earnestly protested. It took the position that such a policy could not be pursued without the practical certainty of gross and palpable violations of the law of nations, particularly if submarine craft were to be employed as its instruments, inasmuch as the rules prescribed by that law, rules founded upon principles of humanity and established for the protection of the lives of noncombatants at sea, could not in the nature of the case be observed by such vessels. It based its protest on the ground that persons of neutral nationality and vessels of neutral ownership would be exposed to extreme and intolerable risks, and that no right to close any part of the high seas against their use or to expose them to such risks could lawfully be asserted by any belligerent Government. The law of nations in these matters, upon which the Government of the United States based its protest, is not of recent origin or founded upon merely arbitrary principles set up by convention. It is based, on the contrary, upon manifest and imperative principles of humanity, and has long been established with the approval and by the express assent of all civilized nations.

Notwithstanding the earnest protest of our Government, the Imperial German Government at once proceeded to carry out the policy it had announced. It expressed the hope that the dangers involved, at any rate the dangers to neutral vessels, would be reduced to a minimum by the instructions which it had issued to its submarine commanders, and assured the Government of the United States that it would take every possible precaution both to respect the rights of neutrals and to safeguard the lives of noncombatants.

What has actually happened in the year which has since elapsed has shown that those hopes were

Reflectors of God

*A SERMON BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

TEXT—Gen. 33:10. "I have seen thy face, as though I had seen the face of God."

WHEN the storm-cloud in his brother's heart broke up into smiles, the fugitive knew that the storm-cloud in God's heart was transmuted into smiles. He inferred the one from the other. By our conduct we are influencing the shape of men's thoughts about God. Jacob judged the disposition of God by what he found in Esau. If Esau had met Jacob differently, if, instead of forgiveness, he had met him with hatred, and if instead of with tears he had met him with frowns, how do you think Jacob might have regarded God? If a man is hungering for forgiveness on earth and forgiveness in heaven, and finds that forgiveness on earth is denied, might he not take the denial as the sign that for him there is no forgiveness in heaven, that he has to deal with an unfriendly and relentless God?

It is hard for any man to believe in the forgiveness of God when he finds no forgiveness among men. The one proof of the forgiveness of God for which many souls are waiting is to find forgiveness among God's children. Unforgiveness on earth clouds the sky of many a man's heaven. Souls that are conscious of great needs are prone to form their thoughts of God from the dispositions which they find in us. Well, how do we represent God? Suppose that the prodigal, in our Lord's parable, when he was returning home with a soul pining for forgiveness and love, had first of all met with the elder brother. Suppose he had looked into that elder brother's face to find there some hint as to the reception he would meet with from his father, is it not very probable that he would have gone back again into degradation, and have regarded the father as his foe? The face of the elder brother would have given a cruel misrepresentation of his father's face. And yet, like Jacob with Esau, men often take their conception of the Father's face from the face of his sons, and for the representation we give we shall be held responsible.

It is one of the fundamental beliefs in the Christian life that our Lord lives in his redeemed and sanctified children. A Christian man is a man whose life is inhabited by Christ. A Christian woman is a woman whose life is inhabited by Christ. We are only the houses, Christ is the Guest. Christ looks through us, speaks through us, works through us. We live, yet not we, Christ liveth in us. If that is not Christianity, what is it? Christianity means that Christ comes into human life, lays hold of these avenues of sense, employs them as the channels of grace, uses our eyes, our hands, our voices, all our features and powers, to reveal himself to others. That is our creed, the Biblical creed, the same yesterday, to-day and forever. A Christian is a man who seeks to show the world the likeness of Christ. A perfect Christian would be a man or woman on whom the needy would gaze and say, "I have seen thy face as though I had seen the face of God."

Now, if that be the profession which we make to the world, that as Christians we are endeavoring to show forth the likeness of Christ, how infinitely important it is that we should not misrepresent him, that when any needy soul lifts his eyes upon us he may truly see in us the disposition of his God. There are three great presences in the world, which as Christians we have to face. We have to face sin; we have to face infirmity; and we have to face penitence. Now the world wants to know what Christ thinks and feels about these: how he is disposed toward sin, how he is disposed toward infirmity, how he is disposed toward repentance. And how does the world find it out? Very often by looking into the face of Christ's children, and reading there the mind and heart of Christ. Jacob looked into Esau's face, and from that inferred the face of God. And the world looks into our faces to see how our Master views sin and infirmity and repentance; and we are to look to it that, before each of them, men are to see in our face the face of Christ.

WELL, now, every day we have to stand in the presence of sin and face it. When men who are engaged in sin, dealing in uncleanness look up at us, they are to see the very face of Christ. What kind of a face had Christ in the presence of sin? He had a face of hostility and intense indignation. What is indignation? Indignation is the recoil of offended dignity; it is the anger of injured love. Where there is most love there can be most indignation. Where there is no love, indignation cannot exist. Passion can exist where there is no love and so can bad temper; but we must always distinguish between indignation and revenge. Indignation is a fire that burns to refine. Revenge is a fire that burns to destroy. Indignation is fed by love; nay, it is love. Revenge is fed by selfishness; nay, it is selfishness. Where you can have much selfishness you can have much revenge. Where you have much love you can have much indignation. A life that has little love never warms to righteous anger. Where love in a man's heart is only like twilight, you can't get much fire; but where love fills a man's heart like light fills the noontide, then you have material for a fire. Fire is focused light. Indignation is focused love; it is love burning.

Look at Christ in the little home at Bethany, to which he has retired from the bustling city to spend a quiet evening with his bosom friends. His love falls upon the family group like soft, cheery sunlight. But look at him when he stands in the presence of bad men, who "devour widows' houses," and make unjust gain of the fatherless, and who cover up their wickedness with the thin pretense of prayer, and then his love does not beam in soft sunlight; it is focused in fiery indignation. It blazes forth in words of condemnation that fall upon men's hearts like burning lead. Look at Paul, when he meets with those few praying souls under the blue heaven of the riverside, to pray. His love breathes out a gracious influence, soft and genial as the warm air of a summer's morn. But see him when he stands in the presence of dissimulation, hypocrisy and injustice, and the quiet sunlight of his love changes into burning indignation, and flashes forth in condemnation. For sin, love has nothing but burnings, everlasting burnings. As long as sin exists, there must be a furnace of fire, call it by whatever name you please. Love can do nothing with sin except burn it. The love that is the light of heaven is also the fire of hell. Before sin, God's face is one of indignation, of burning love. "The face of the Lord is against them that do evil."

Now, how is it with us? Do we represent or misrepresent that face of God in the presence of sin? When sinful men look at us, at our faces, do they see a true representation of the face of God? I am not wishing to suggest that wherever we see the presence of sin, we should loudly shout our condemnation. I do not mean to say that, when we see the crooked ways of the world, we should immediately lash ourselves into frenzied expressions of disapproval. But I do mean to say that in the presence of sin a Christian man will show no signs of approval, or he wofully misrepresents the face of God. There is nothing which so feeds a bad man in his badness as Christian applause. There is nothing which so encourages sinful ways as to discover symptoms of approval on a Christian face. And isn't that the danger to which as Christian men we are exposed? For purposes of expediency we temporize and compromise. We beam sunlight when we ought to flash fire Our face expresses applause where it ought to express dissent. We laugh at coarse jests. We smile at men's descriptions of their own dirty ways. And the coarse jester and the trickster look at our faces, and, finding there these slight hints of approval, are encouraged to go deeper in their lax and vulgar life. By an indifferent or an approving face we make men think more lightly of sin, and to make men think more lightly of sin is to make them ink more lightly of God.

We want the face of Jesus in the presence sin.
We want the face of honest indignation set agai all vulgarity and sin. I believe there is a great d l of public sinfulness and public indecency and perv sity which could be shamed away by the absolute ith-drawal of Christian applause. There is a great l of public vulgarity which could be burned away the fire of Christian indignation. We could all h to purify humanity if we ceased to give the devil t aid of our smiles. Don't let us countenance sin; t is, don't let us give it our countenance, our face; us face it with disapproval. Let us show the worl hat sin offends our manhood and womanhood, and nds in our Christian love a hostile force. Let sinfu nen see in us what they will eternally find in God, a termined and unceasing repugnance to all sin, s hat when they look into your face and mine they n in very truth see in it the face of God.

BUT there is another presence we have to ice.
We have to face infirmity—all manner of potent folk, crushed under many burdens, stricke ith much grief. Now infirmity wants to know how rist thinks and feels about it, and it looks up in the Christian face to find hints about the mind and art of Christ. Now, how shall we truly represent m?
How did Christ's love reveal him in the prese of infirmities? Shall I read you one or two verses ich are quite familiar to us all? "There cometh to n a leper, . . . and Jesus was moved with compa on, and touched him." "Two blind men sat by th ayside; Jesus was moved with compassion." ow when he drew near to the gate of the city, b old, there was carried out one that was dead, the on son of his mother, and she was a widow. And whe the Lord saw her, he had compassion on her." A the compassion in that big heart of his looked out his face when he stood in the presence of infirmit nd grief.

The apostle James had seen a great deal the Master's face, and he sums up the description all that he had seen in these simply beautiful ds.
"The Lord is very pitiful." The Christ's face, the presence of the world's burdens and griefs, was li ted up with wondrous pity and compassion, and are to represent that face in the world today. ese aching, weary, heavy-laden lives are wondering hat heaven is thinking about them, and they are try to satisfy their wonder by looking at the Christia ce.
And sometimes they find Christian faces empt of pity, and they come to think heaven is emptied o ve.
So Christ is misrepresented by his own.

Our danger is this: we become accustomed the sight of infirmity and sorrow. It is just a familia ar of our surroundings. The passing funeral awakens no more, or little more, thought than th ing of the tram-car. The blind man becomes as no ticed as the curbstone. Sorrow and burdens b so familiar as to cease to break the spell of our th ht.
Familiarity lures us into indifference, and indiff turns the face into an awful blank. Then the c life looks up into the blank face, and painfully w ers if God's face is blank too. Oh, that is the ag many a life that drags itself along in chronic we and weariness and grief—the agony of wonde
God becomes accustomed to the sight of pain, his face becomes a blank, if out of it there fades aw the light of a fresh compassion!

It is the privilege of good men and women to ake it easier for the weary and the heavy-laden to eve in the compassion of a good God. It is the pr ege of a Christian to make it easier for the widow a the orphan to believe in the love of Christ. If my e is full of pity they will dare to hope in the comp sion of my Christ. But it is hard work to look bey the indifference and all the blank faces of your tian fellow men, and believe in the pitifulness Christ. It is easier for men at midnight to beli the existence of the great sun, when they can s moon riding in the heavens, and shining with lig flected from the unseen orb. And it is easier fo and women, whose souls have to pass through ness, through valleys full of black shadows easier for them to believe in the compassion of th of Righteousness, when they see reflections light, and experience the compassion of God's ch

Let our light so shine before men, that they glorify our Father in heaven. Let our pitifulnes them an assurance of the pitifulness of God, that they look at our face, they may exclaim wit
"I have seen thy face as though I had seen the the Lord!"

My Plea

By Eben E. Rexford

FATHER, this I ask of thee,
Knowing thou wilt grant the plea:
Strength for weakness, this I pray,
As I need it, day by day;
I'll not ask a lifted load,
Or a smooth and thornless road;
Simply strength to help me bear
All life's burdens—this my prayer.

Give me strength that I may make
Some one glad for thy dear sake,—
Strength to lift from sorrowing heart
Grief that makes a teardrop start.
O my Father, grant the plea
That I make today of thee—
That, at even, I may say,
"I have helped a soul today."

The Sense of the Future

SUNDAY, May 7. Rev. 21:2. "I saw the holy city, the new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven." This man saw the finished city when the walls had scarcely begun to rise. I gazed upon the top-stone on the day the foundat n stone was laid. He lived in the city before it was lt. His eyes surveyed the waving harvest when t seed was only newly sown. He ate its bread hore the sheaves had been gathered in. He had a reat and sacred sense of the future. He felt the d's before him. He was inspired by the strength o inished purposes. He looked to the joy that was s before him. Amid the grim confinements of Fmos he saw the new Jerusalem, and he walked it bright and golden streets.

t is this sense of the coming day which gives the sd power to endure. It inspires the song which nkes the nimble feet. "They talked about the c to which they were going." Yes, and that is a ays the kind of communion which braces the p rims to meet and overcome the renewed antagonns of the road. The social reformer, toiling amid n e and enmity, amid brick-dust and mire, must lc to the city to which he is going. The patriot—of n trudging over roads of pain, and sorrow, and u peakable desolation—must hug the thought of th established righteousness and the richer, purer fr dom which are hidden away over the horizon. W must feed our souls with the visions of the finisd city, with its gleaming minarets and towers. T be imprisoned in Patmos, with no alluring glory of the holy city, is a paralyzing exile; but to be in P nos in the company of that vision is to breathe th invigorating air of home.

is this sense of the future which we so much nd today. Our life is bigger than the passing hour. W must relate today to tomorrow. The sharp, d ructive sweeps of the plowshare, shearing the r s of ten thousand flowers, must be related to the c ing golden grain. We must link the bare overtu ed clods with the harvest-home! "We are sa d by hope." Brave, consecrated men and women, d ting their strength to holy causes, are not moving an lind and futile circles; they are moving on God's ro to ever-brightening issues. "The path of the ju is as a shining light that shineth more and more, ev unto the perfect day." It is our wisdom to li and move and have our being in the power of th glorious expectation! J. H. J.

The Mission of the Jews

MONDAY, May 8. Isa. 66:13-24. "I will send those that escape of them unto the nations." The Je were intended to be the leaders of mankind. Th r civilization antedates that of the modern world. M es preceded Lycurgus by at least 800 years. B re Troy fell, or Homer sang, or Ulysses went on is wanderings, God had called Abram to become th ancestor of an elect race. That is a great word, bu it has been grossly misunderstood. It has been su osed to mean that in election a blessing was co nunicated to a few for their exclusive benefit, w h the great masses of men were neither allowed no intended to share. It would hardly be possible n entirely to misread the divine purpose. Election s ot exclusive, but inclusive. It is not for the few bu he many; not for selfish ease, but for strenuous ser ce. Israel was elect, not for herself, but that she mi t pass on to the world the knowledge and grace of hich she was the trustee.

raham was blessed that he might be a blessing; an this was intended to be the characteristic of his pe le; but when they refused, when they shut themsel s up in haughty exclusiveness, when they crucifie the Messiah and rejected the testimony of the ap tles, there was no alternative than that God should as them aside, and substitute the church as his ns ument for the revelation of his great purpose of ov This was the source of profound sorrow to the ap tle Paul. He said that he had great sorrow and in asing pain, that he could even wish himself a ersed from Christ on their behalf. But he saw le ly that God would graft the branches again into he original stock, that all Israel would be saved, an that the receiving of them back again would be he ife of the world. It is this that Isaiah anticipa in the passage before us when he says that when he ews have recognized their long-lost brother, not oh but Jesus, they will be commissioned to go out to bring the Gentiles to God, and be the missionaries of the world. The Christian's Freedom

TUESDAY, May 9. Gal. 5:1. "For freedom did Christ set us free: stand fast therefore, and be not entangled again in a yoke of bondage." Some people still think of the Christian life as a bondage, a kind of strait-jacket, which one who wished happiness should postpone putting on as long as possible. Paul, however, is often found speaking of being a free man in Christ Jesus, and in the meditation of the day he speaks of freedom as the particular boon of the Christian.

What is the secret of Christian freedom? Is it having a "good time"? Is it "getting everything that is coming to us"? A German author has spoken a word that is thought-productive: "If one is always claiming his rights, the world is like a hell." Many a man at the height of worldly success will tell you that success is dust and ashes, if he has gained that success by casting off the responsibilities God intended him to carry.

Christian freedom is the opportunity God gives us to voluntarily choose nobility and useful service to others, when we could take the easy path of self-indulgence. The devoted father who toils at the foot of the mountain, accepting, uncompelled by any force save the high call of a noble purpose, meager material rewards in order that his son may climb the mountain into the celestial heights of learning—that father knows true freedom. Is not that father free to lay down his self-accepted burden at any time? But he knows he could not endure a choice that would cost him the higher happiness of sacrifice for a thing beloved.

Christian freedom lies in the power we possess of following something other than the highest that is in us. The self-control to take the noblest instead of the selfish path—that is the sign of the liberty that makes men divine. C. S. C.

The Mystery of the Atonement

WEDNESDAY, May 10. Lev. 1:10-17 and Ps. 40:6, 7. The Hebrew word for "burnt-offering" indicates its leading feature. It means an ascending offering—one that goes up to God with a grateful savor. It is often called in Scripture the "whole burnt sacrifice," because it was entirely consumed. No part might be kept back from the altar-fire. Surely such was our Lord's gift on our behalf. He yielded himself without reservation to the sacrifice of Calvary. The apostle says that he beseeches us, by the mercy of God, to present our bodies as living sacrifices unto God; but is not this precisely what Jesus did? The mystery of the Atonement is the one offering of the body of Christ. The mystery of perfected Redemption is that, in the body which was raised from the dead, the eternal intercession of our Lord is offered for us before the throne.

On the Sabbath, two lambs for a burnt-offering were offered, morning and evening; but all through these sacrifices this feature must be borne in mind: that whereas in their case it was involuntary sacrifice, in our Lord's case it was from first to last voluntary. He offered himself, without spot, to God; no cords were needed, no constraint. He might have called for twelve legions of angels, but he would not. He might, by one flash of indwelling power, have deprived his enemies of the power to hurt him, but it was not put forth. He gave himself wholly and voluntarily for our salvation. What return should we make but give ourselves equally to him!

The Ability to Wait

THURSDAY, May 11. James 1:4. "And let patience have its perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, lacking in nothing." Here in America we do not lack activity. We are a people of accomplishment. It is a difficult country for any one to be happy in who is without a regular routine of activities. It is natural that we should forget at times that the Bible commends other virtues besides those connected with constant serving. There are passive as well as active virtues, and one of these which receives high mention in the Scripture is patience, the ability to wait.

There are times in all of our lives when this quality is greatly needed. Its presence has saved many a life from going on the rocks. In the hours when we come up against a blank wall, through sorrow or disaster, it almost seems that God is testing us to see whether we can reach up to that perfection of which the apostle speaks, or gain the confidence in Jehovah that will enable us to obey and be patient, even when we can not see the road ahead.

Coleridge, with his penetrating mind, said that there were three great words, Love, Hope and Patience, and that there were times when patience was greater than either of the other two.

In life's battles we frequently do not need fighting strength so much as waiting strength. To be patient means that we really believe in God, that he means good for us, and we show that belief by waiting patiently for his promises to be fulfilled. C. S. C.

The Meaning of Sacrifice

FRIDAY, May 12. Lev. 2:1-11 and 1 Peter 2:22. There were three kinds of meal-offerings. The first, of flour finely ground and sifted; the second, of cakes, baked on a flat pan; and the third, of freshly gathered ears of corn, dried and parched by the fire. Salt and oil were invaluable ingredients, but honey and leaven were wholly excluded. Honey soon becomes sour and is liable to fermentation, while leaven is generally regarded as the emblem of corruption; and therefore these two substances were obviously inconsistent with the object of this offering, which was intended to represent the character of the Man Christ Jesus. There was nothing to mar the absolute beauty and symmetry of his character. Those who are bold in action are often deficient in gentleness. If we are tender-hearted, we may be wanting in fidelity. Our patience may become indifference and our love too indulgent. But when we look at Christ, we see that his character was perfectly balanced. Always and everywhere, he was the perfect Man.

One ingredient of the meal-offering was frankincense—a most precious and fragrant perfume. As it was spread over the showbread—loaves that were presented on the golden altar—it sweetened the atmosphere of the holy place, and when added to the meal-offering it told of the purity and preciousness of Him whose name is as ointment poured forth. Another ingredient was oil, and we remember our Lord's own words: "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me." Only a part of the meal-offering was consumed; the remainder was eaten by the priests in the Holy Place. By this we are reminded of the necessity of daily fellowship with the Saviour. He must be the strength, the stay, the nutriment of our life. We have meat to eat that the world knows not of.

God's Legion of Honor

SATURDAY, May 13. Matt. 16:24. "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me." The order of the Iron Cross grew out of the great need of Frederick William III of Prussia; he had used up all the nation's wealth in war. The people accordingly brought all their jewelry of gold and silver to be melted into money for the government. For each ornament presented, they received another of iron or of bronze containing the inscription, "I gave gold for iron. 1813."

The Iron Cross of Germany, like the Victoria Cross of England and the Cross of the Legion of Honor in France, is generally bestowed in recognition of heroism in battle. Christianity's cross is borne in self-denial for Jesus' sake. When the two pieces of wood which go to make up a cross lie side by side, there is no cross; but when the shorter piece—the human will—is placed across the longer one—the divine will—then we have the cross. Oftentimes, when great afflictions fall upon the soul, God's will seems unbearable; but if we bear our cross lovingly, it brings to us here blessed resignation, and yonder, an eternal weight of glory.

In God's Legion of Honor, for iron he gives gold; we bring to him our little treasures and he transforms them into unsearchable riches. All are heroes in the army of the Lord. When our wills are perfectly surrendered, then there is no cross, for we lie alongside him in perfect peace, blessed rest and holy love. It is then we bring our gifts gladly, for the progress of his kingdom and the honor of his name. E. W. C.

A Week in the World's News

Practical Castles in the Air. In line with the nation-wide development of interest in the welfare of the birds, St. Paul, Minn., in the second week in April held its second annual Exhibition of Bird Houses made by the boys of the public schools. The youthful architects of castles in the air were inspired and guided by Mr. D. V. Ferguson, supervisor of manual training. Five thousand boys exhibited bird houses; and in the fashioning of their exhibits they must have gained, inevitably, a deeper interest in the feathered citizens of the woods who should be the future tenants.

The Country Church a National Necessity. By proclamation of the governor of the state, the people of Virginia will observe Sunday, May 7, as "Country Church Day." The governor said in his proclamation: "To the country churches of the state and nation is committed a great task and a great trust—the building of characters of men and women who make up the greater part of our population, both rural and urban. The country church is a necessity of civilization, and not only must it be perpetuated and encouraged, but its sphere of usefulness must be constantly widened, so that it may reach its proper position as the community center."

Arbitration Wins Again. A strike of 13,000 workers on the new subways in New York city, which had seriously interfered with all construction work since April 3, was settled on April 19 by Chairman Straus of the Public Service Commission, who acted as mediator in the dispute. The unions won recognition and a small increase in wages; the contractors won a working agreement which, it is expected, will prevent any further delay in subway construction.

To Develop Alaska. On April 14 Secretary of the Interior Lane announced the establishment under the Alaska Engineering Commission of a Land and Industrial Department to be located at Seward. This department will have general charge of all the public lands affected by the new government built railroad. It will select and survey town sites and supervise the sale of lots. The purpose of the department is to bring about a closer cooperation between merchant, miner and farmer, and to encourage development of all the varied resources contributory to the railroad.

Ships Again Running the Panama Canal Gauntlet. The Panama Canal was opened to traffic on April 15 with a depth of thirty feet, which will be increased to forty feet as fast as possible. Fifteen merchant vessels and one army transport passed through the canal on the 15th.

To Plant a Million Pines. The state of Massachusetts between this time and the first of June will plant about 500 acres of pines. Massachusetts began in 1908 to reforest her waste places. About 5,000 acres have been planted in 130 different lots. The state forester says that this is the proper time for the transplanting of conifers, but that the work should be completed before June 1.

Canadian Provinces for Suffrage. Since the first of the year, three Canadian provinces, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta, have granted political equality to women, Saskatchewan taking final action on March 14.

Cheap Motor Fuel. Announcement was made at Farmingdale, Long Island, on April 14 that Mr. Louis Enricht had perfected a process by which the addition of cheap chemicals to water would produce a motor fuel at a cost of one and one-half cents a gallon. Various tests before newspaper men appeared to give satisfactory results and Mr. Enricht himself announced that his friend, B. F. Yoakum, was going to market the new fuel. Scientists have said that the Enricht process is impossible, which warrants the average man in taking a hopeful view of it. In the meantime efforts are being made to utilize the Rietman process and other processes and thus recover more gasoline from a given quantity of crude oil than is now obtained. Efforts are also being made to adapt kerosene to automobile engines.

New Commercial Treaty. It was unofficially announced in Washington April 17 that David R. Francis, new American Ambassador to Russia, would carry with him a new treaty of commerce to serve as a basis for negotiations with the Russian government. Since the treaty of commerce which had existed for nearly a hundred years with Russia was denounced by the Taft administration because of the refusal of the Russian government to honor American passports in the hands of Jews, commerce between Russia and America has been carried on under a modus vivendi under which the stipulations of the former treaty were followed. Both countries have been looking for common ground on which a new treaty might be drawn.

Miniature War in China. Dispatches of April 13 and 16 told of fighting between government troops and revolutionaries at Canton, in which about thirty combatants were killed, and of fighting between soldiers of the northern army and a mob at Changchowfu, province of Fukien, in which thirty-two soldiers and forty civilians were killed.

Another New Haven Accident. A rear-end collision in which an express telescoped the rear car of a local at Bradford, Rhode Island, on the New Haven Railroad on April 17 cost the lives of five passengers and caused injuries to more than thirty others. As in the recent wreck on the New York Central, fog enters as one of the causes, and there is a disagreement regarding the condition of the signals and the observance of such signals as were set.

Risking the Yellow Peril. France is importing Chinese laborers to take the place in agriculture and industry left vacant by the men who have gone to the front; five thousand such laborers are expected within a few months.

Will Build Water Plant in South America. The American International Corporation, recently formed to promote better commercial relations between the United States and South America, announced recently that they had undertaken, at the request of the government of Uruguay, entire charge of the construction and financing of a new water supply system, which is expected to involve an expenditure of about $5,000,000, much of which will be spent for materials in this country.

The Work of Congress. The Senate passed the Army Bill on April 18 after raising the maximum peace strength of the army to 250,000 as compared with 140,000 provided in the House bill. The bill also provided for a reserve force of 260,000, for the federalization of the National Guard at an estimated strength of 280,000, for the creation of a school and college youths' reserve corps of an estimated strength of from 200,000 to 400,000; and included provisions for vocational education of enlisted men in agriculture or the mechanical arts, for Federal pay of National Guard officers above the rank of captain, and appropriated $15,000,000 for a government nitrate plant. The bill immediately went to conference. It was also repor on April 18 that the House and nate conferees had been unable to ag e on the sugar bill, the House still st ding for unconditional repeal of th free sugar law. By a vote of 118 45, the House on April 18 retained the Agricultural Appropriation Bi the $250,000 item for the distribut n of free garden seeds by members o Congress.

Court Decision Aids Safet On April 17 the Supreme Court the United States construed the leral Safety Appliance Act so that employees, no matter whether e aged in intrastate or interstate com erce, may recover damages for injur occurring through failure of the r ls to comply with the laws regarding fety equipment. The court held th the law applied to all railroads enga d in interstate commerce.

Munition Makers on Strike Disorders incident to a strike of 3,5 men employed by the National Cond and Cable Company at Hastings-on-H son, New York, finally forced the sh ff to ask for the National Guard. T N. C. & C. Co. has been manufa ring munitions and has refused to gr t an advance of five cents an hour as l by the strikers.

Building with Greater are. Eight years ago the Dominion g ernment began the construction the famous Quebec Bridge over t St. Lawrence River, which, when ompleted, will be the largest car ever bridge in the world. The brid was estimated to cost $6,000,000 ar it is now approaching completion, it eing expected that the last rivet be placed some time in October; b the cost will be $17,000,000. Whe partially constructed, the first spa collapsed, killing several workme and some engineers then stated th the bridge was too large, that its ight was greater than could be sup rted by the individual members.

A Mexican Invasion. Th boll weevil entered the United State rom Mexico in 1892 and made him f at home in the Rio Grande coun y of Texas, gradually extending the a of his invasion into Louisiana and uthern Oklahoma. Experts predic that the entire cotton belt will be i cted this year. There is only on sure method of attack against the eevil —the rotating of crops leaves the eevil nothing to feed upon. Burni and plowing under of the infested tton plants, the burning of all brush aps, and the picking of infested cotton ring the growing season are efficient s to crop rotation in the eradication the pest. Sprays of poison have pro d of little value.

Would Allay the War ver. Many congregations througho the country are taking up the sub t of "preparedness" and making a rong and earnest plea to their represen ives in Congress not to give way to t war madness. A reader in Worcester, ass., sends us a series of resolutions a pted by the members of the United sbyterian Church of that city, de ring that "preparedness" is contrary the established policy of the nation d to the sober judgment of the peopl that it is futile and does not preven war that it makes war increasingly pr ble; that it is opposed to the teachi s Jesus and the Bible, and that it uld hopelessly postpone world-peace. imilar action has been taken b the New York Synod of the United sbyterian Church of North Americ representing 125 congregations and ,00 communicants, including the ston Presbytery.

HE MEXICAN SITUATION. Followin the treacherous attack upon Americ troops by Carranza troops at Pa al, General Pershing called in all th advance guards and concentrated hi roops at Santa Cruz and at the variou bases and points of vantage along h line of communications. Secretary Ba er at once sent Major General H h L. Scott, Chief of Staff, to San A nio to confer with General Funston, an it was suggested that General Sc t might meet General Obregon at h border. General Scott reached Ge eral Funston's headquarters on Ap l 21, and it was expected that he wo d not be able to make a full report o Vashington under ten days. In h meantime, all available troops were e sent into Mexico to strengthen he American forces. Later reports b that American troops had almost v aken the principal band of Villa's ol vers, with which Villa was probably ra ling. It is also stated that the e rts of cooperation by Carranza ro s earlier in the life of the expedition e unfounded. Parral was a center f illa sentiment, and it is not quite le whether General Lozano was more ry attached to Villa or to Carranza, r hether his apparent inability to con- ro his troops was real. He was re- o d to have threatened the Ameri- a at Santa Cruz after Colonel Brown a reached Major Tompkins with ei prcements. No further attack oc- u d. The reported death of Villa e s to have been greatly exaggerated. h he was wounded at Guerrero has e established. The latest reports e ved by the advance detachments f e American troops indicated that il with a considerable band was still e ng southward toward Durango, n hat his capture was only prevented y e interposition of Carranza troops t arral. Carranza is still insistent a the American expedition should be i lrawn. Secretary Baker has stated a t will continue until it accomplishes s bject. At the present writing no i lrawal has been made and no r er advance is being attempted.

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

AOTHER British cabinet crisis, perhaps the severest since the war e a, was met and passed, perhaps uld be more accurate to say tem- o ily postponed, during the week is finished. This crisis arose over e question of compulsory military r e.

e Labor Party, with Mr. Asquith one portion of the cabinet, fought g st this proposition, while another o on of the cabinet, led by Mr. l George and supported outside e abinet by the principal British papers, struggled earnestly for s mediate adoption. It is practically admitted by all competent persons in Great Britain that the various schemes adopted to date, including the Derby recruiting plan, have failed to produce a sufficient supply of men, not only to enable Great Britain to increase the size of her armies, but even to make up the waste of war and disease.

The military expert of the London Times, in the Times of March 22, stated that at home and abroad Great Britain had then of troops raised in Great Britain, without reference to her colonial troops, seventy divisions, much below strength, and estimated that for the year 1916 there would be needed imperatively 1,400,000 men. At full strength seventy divisions would be some 1,307,000 men; but as these divisions are expressly stated to be "much below strength," at the very least 10 per cent. must be deducted for this reason, leaving the net strength at about 1,070,000. How many of these are at home we do not know, but it seems safe to assume that at least 25 per cent. are still in the United Kingdom, which would leave some 800,000 on service abroad, scattered from India to France. The colonial troops, except about 60,000 Canadians, are all on other fronts than the west, and consequently the British army on the west front cannot apparently at the present time exceed 600,000 to 650,000, a condition of affairs which has provoked much severe criticism of late in the French papers, which criticisms the French government is now allowing to be printed.

Matters being in this condition and recruits not coming forward were the moving causes which produced the week's crisis in the British cabinet. Mr. Asquith, who expected to make an announcement to Parliament on Tuesday, April 18, concerning the government's policy, was unable to do so, and on Wednesday was again obliged further to postpone it. On Thursday an agreement was arrived at, wherein, it is reported, the Labor Party acquiesced, to make a further and final trial for a period of two months of the voluntary system, with the understanding that in event that enough men for the needs of the army did not come forward in that period conscription would be introduced. It was announced that the full situation would be laid before Parliament on Tuesday, April 25, at the first secret session of Parliament since 1878.

The total casualties among British officers up to March 1 are officially stated to have been 23,962, of whom 7,240 have been killed, 14,755 wounded and 1,787 missing or prisoners. The large proportion of killed to wounded is worthy of notice.

In February there were two brigadier generals and four colonels killed and four brigadier generals wounded among the higher officers.

The Allies have seized Suda Bay, Crete, in Greek territory, as a naval base, whereat Greece has protested. The question of the use of Greek railroads for transporting Serbian troops from the Island of Corfu in the Adriatic to Salonica, on the Ægean, has also not been solved to the satisfaction of Greece, and the general relations between Greece and the Allies appear strained.

In Mesopotamia the British army attempting to relieve General Townshend's forces in Kut-el Amara has had alternate successes and defeats during the past week. On Saturday and Sunday this army made rather marked progress forward on the right bank of the Tigris, driving in and occupying the Turkish advanced lines, besides inflicting severe punishment on them and taking a considerable number of prisoners; but on Wednesday the Turks made a successful counter-attack, which retook from the British the lost ground and caused them heavy casualties.

The rest of the week, though fighting continued, neither side appears to have gained any particular advantage. Meanwhile, General Townshend's situation does not improve. It has now come to light that the civil population of Kut was ejected by the British some time ago, in order to save food for the troops; but the Turks say that General Townshend's supplies are running very low.

In the Caucasus in the early part of the week the Russians after a hard battle on the left bank of the Karadere, southeast of Trebizond, in which the navy assisted by flanking the Turkish positions with its fire, succeeded in dislodging the Turks from their positions there, and as the Turks relied on these positions for the defense of Trebizond, their capture was followed a couple of days later by the occupation of that city by the Russians. Trebizond is the most important town on the Black Sea coast east of Constantinople, and while its capture is undoubtedly of importance in giving the Russians a naval base on the southern coast of that sea and the resulting advantage in the speedy provisioning of their armies operating in that region, it can hardly be regarded in any sense as the key to Constantinople. Distance alone precludes its playing any such rôle, as it is over 450 miles from the capital.

The Austro-Italian campaign pursued its rather monotonous course during the week. Practically the only stirring event was one which happened on Wednesday, when the Italians climbed 3,300 meters, about 10,000 feet, up a mountain, and on the crest, surrounded by glaciers, captured one Austrian officer and thirty men, all of which was done while a great storm was raging.

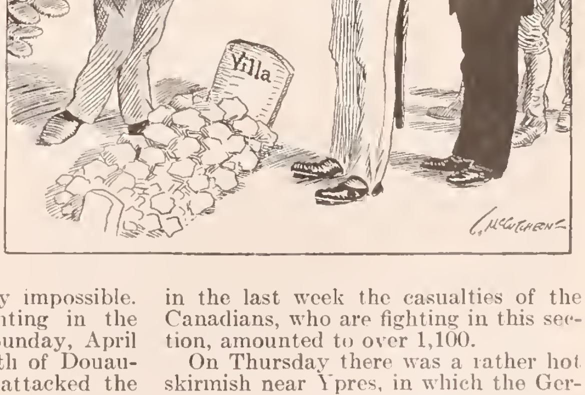
Outside of this achievement there were only the usual bombardment and desultory skirmishes, resulting in nothing. Italy still remains at peace with Germany, by the way.

The improvement expected in the relations of Great Britain and Holland has not materialized, owing, perhaps, to the fact that the British have again seized the mails on Dutch ships on voyages to the Dutch East Indies and to the Argentine.

Nothing of any importance has taken place on the Russian front in Europe, though there have been quite a number of unconnected skirmishes and some artillery duels. From the movements of the German troops the Russian military critics predict that General von Hindenburg is about to make a strong effort to take Dunaburg.

ALAS, POOR VILLA! DEAD AGAIN.

[Copyright: 1916 By John T. McCutcheon.]



DURING the week just passed, owing to bad weather, the fighting on the Verdun front has not been as violent as heretofore. The effect of weather is not fully comprehended and would require too much space to explain fully, but it may be pointed out that bad weather not only affects the spirits and the morale of the men, but if enough rain falls to thoroughly soften the ground it makes the movement of artillery, that inseparable adjunct of modern armies, difficult, and in the case of heavy pieces practically impossible.

The only infantry fighting in the battle on Saturday and Sunday, April 15 and 16, took place south of Douaumont, where the French attacked the German positions and, according to their account, made some gains and took a couple of hundred prisoners. The Germans, however, reported this attack repulsed.

On the west front for the whole of the two days there was great artillery activity, centering on the Avocourt region and on Hill No. 304. All Sunday night, however, the German artillery continued its heavy bombardment of the line through Avocourt, Le Mort Homme and Cumières, which bombardment continued all day Monday.

Tuesday the infantry fighting again began, this time on the north front, where the Germans attacked and carried the French positions on the Steinbruck ridge, 700 yards south of the Haudremont farm, and on the ridge northwest of Thiaumont farm. This latter farm lies almost directly south of Douaumont and borders on the road running from Bras eastward to Thiaumont Fort, the distance between the places being about 7,000 feet.

The taking of the position on the ridge northwest of this, coupled with the taking of the positions on the Steinbruck ridge southeast of the Haudremont farm, advances the German lines on this portion of the northern front to the nearest point to Bras and Verdun which they have yet reached.

On Wednesday the Germans near Haudremont, northeast of Verdun, in a bayonet attack in which they claimed heavy casualties were inflicted on the French, captured a stone quarry, around which they had gained a footing a few days before. There was considerable activity west of the Meuse on Hill No. 304 and the French first lines between Dead Man Hill and Cumières. At Les Eparges the Germans, after three attacks, entered French trenches on a front of about 200 yards, but were immediately expelled from them, suffering serious losses.

During Wednesday night the French made an attack on the German positions to the northwest of the Pond of Vaux, south of Vaux, on the north front and captured some German trenches, taking a couple of hundred prisoners.

Thursday there was no infantry fighting at all, but a very severe bombardment on all fronts, lasting all day.

On Friday, coupled with intense activity of artillery on both sides, there were stubborn but minor infantry combats south of Fort Douaumont, and near Le Mort Homme Hill on the west front, in which such advantage as there was fell to the French, who made slight gains at the Haudremont quarry and in the Caurettes wood.

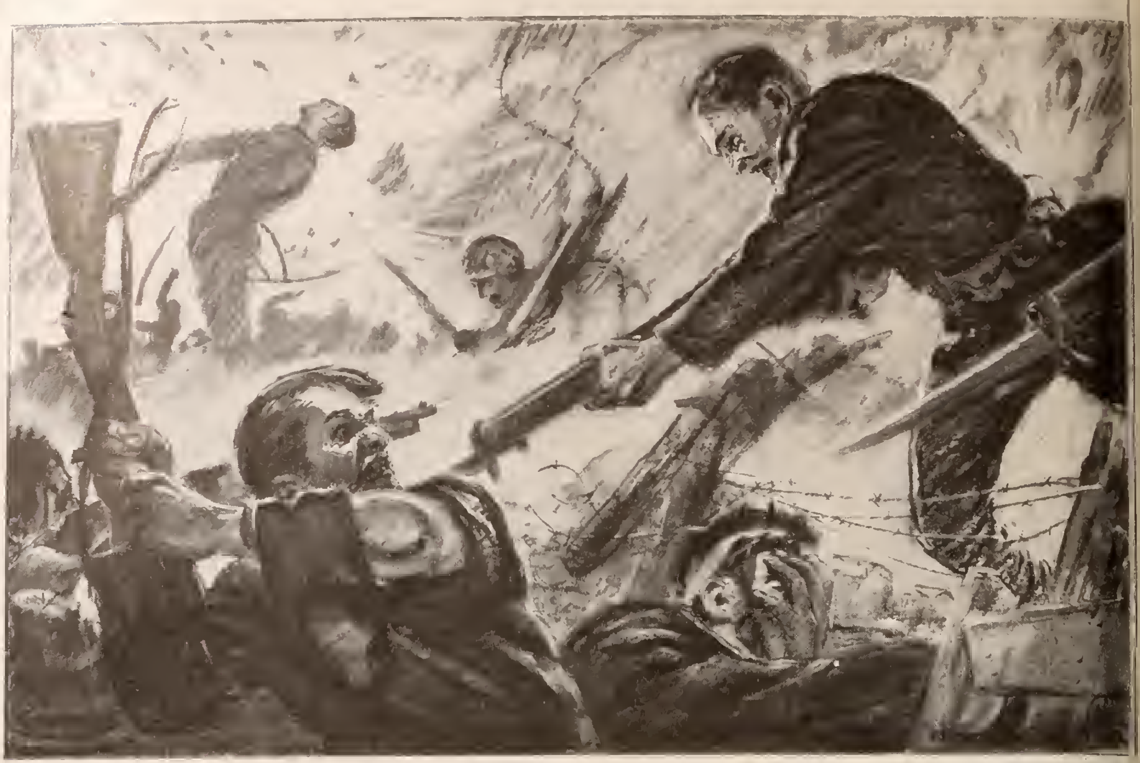
The fighting between the British and the Germans south of St. Eloi continued, and though dismissed with very brief or no mention in the official bulletins seems to have been quite severe, as the British casualty reports show that in the last week the casualties of the Canadians, who are fighting in this section, amounted to over 1,100.

On Thursday there was a rather hot skirmish near Ypres, in which the Germans captured some British trenches and took a few prisoners. This is the first time there has been any serious fighting near Ypres in a long time. On the rest of the western front the events were very minor.

Considerable interest was aroused toward the end of the week by the news that some Russian troops had been landed at Marseilles, France.

FRIENDS REUNITED

For seventy hours the stricken trenches were furrowed and ripped asunder.
A soldier there lay waiting.
Dazedly he recalled "the friendship."
Its strange beginning: in the steerage; bound for America.
Its gradual ripening during those three years together; toiling on the subway job.
Then insensate, unreasoning war between their two fatherlands had dragged each home as "reserves."
"How strange," he mused; "we are enemies now."
Suddenly he began to fire rapidly into the billowing smoke
The enemy were almost on them.
A bayonet tore soggily through his breast—he fired wildly—point-blank—then saw it was his friend.
Limply his friend's body fell across his face.



"ALL THEY THAT TAKE THE SWORD SHALL PERISH WITH THE SWORD." St. Matt. 26:52

Drink and Preparedness

An Interview with Captain Richmond Pearson Hobson

"OUR country can never be properly prepared until all the saloons are closed. Drinking in an army and navy makes inefficiency. The day has come when only the efficient nations will survive. One of the great powers in this European war can blame her present unsatisfactory position upon drink and drink alone.

"In the last fifty years, the manhood of this country has been undermined by drink. We are headed the same way. We shall rot inside so long as the saloons continue their traffic. We shall not be any more fit to defend ourselves than was Rome.

"At the rate we are going, an alarming percentage of our women are becoming heavy drinkers. In the European power which I have in mind, its percentage of women drinkers is the highest in the world. Intemperance breeds one thing: degeneracy of the breed. Just as this power has in the last fifty years bred an enormous number of undersized weaklings, so are we going to do the same thing, unless a halt is called."

It was Captain Richmond P. Hobson speaking. Hobson knows war. He has been in it. He is the same Hobson who ran an old collier, manned with volunteers, under the guns at Santiago, and sank her to bottle up the Spanish fleet. Hobson had seen how men act under fire—sober men and men who drink He knows the relation between drink and war from personal observation. So convinced is he that this nation has approached a crisis in the drink question that he is giving his time to lay the facts before our people. Earnestly he went on to say:

"A crisis has come in the world's history. We are the only great nation not yet immersed in war. Some day we are going to have war. We are not going to make it; it is going to be forced upon us. And we must be ready to meet it. We must be ready with something else besides ships, soldiers, guns. We must be ready with the right kind of men. We are not going to have those men if we as a nation continue our drinking. There is no half-way about it. It is abstinence or drink. When you consider efficiency, there is no such thing as temperate drinking. And I am going to prove this to you with a bill of particulars.

"The Swedish government investigated drink as regards efficiency in its army. A test was held. A squad of Swedish infantrymen were sent on the range for rifle practice. Out of a hundred shots they made thirty perfect hits. Then each marksman received a quart of light beer, which he drank leisurely. A half hour later, the same marksmen were called upon to shoot again. All the men felt refreshed from the beer. They were confident of making a better record. This time they made only four hits out of a hundred shots. That day, that squad of riflemen shot liquor out of the Swedish army. Also, it is being shot out of all the armies in the world, slowly but surely. And for one purpose; efficiency.

"Japan prohibits liquor in her army and navy. When Admiral Togo was in this country, an American officer asked him how he accounted for the remarkable success of the Japanese over the Russians. General Togo replied: 'The cause is not hard to find. They drink vodka; we drink tea.'

"ARMY and navy officers have long realized that drink means inefficiency. The first investigation on this subject came during General Gordon's campaign in India and Egypt. Gordon found that the inefficiency of his soldiers was due to drink. He secured the cooperation of his command, got down and reached the individual soldier, put it up to him. 'What do you want—drink or the success of your country's arms?' The men cooperated splendidly. They eliminated drink, with the result that they reached a remarkable condition of efficiency. Lord Roberts, who was under Gordon in India, made the same test and found it successful. So did Lord Kitchener in his campaign in the Sudan. The result of the findings of these three most notable English soldiers of the last half century was to start a movement in the English army against drink.

Hobson, who believes we face a drink crisis

"At the time of the outbreak of the Boer War, the operations in South Africa were not satisfactory. A scientific commission was appointed to investigate the inefficiency of the English army there, and they found the chief cause to be drink, temperate as well as heavy drinking They found that the drinkers broke down quicker under ong marches and lost their nerve q ker under heavy fire. The result this investigation led the Crown to p the matter before Parliament. A ommission was appointed called the terdepartment Commission. Its c clusions confirmed the investigati of the Boer War. It indicted alcohol for degenerati the men of England. Within fifty years the ph ical requirements of the British Army had to be lo ed. The height had to be reduced six inches, and her physical standards were reduced all down th ine. And for one reason. Drink was causing an i rior breed of Englishmen.

"The English investigation caused France follow, then Germany. The French investigation ablished that drink was the one reason for the de eracy of the nation. It was a case of sober up or ish. About ten years ago, by the order of the govern ent, placards showing the effects of alcohol were put all over France. This began constructive work remodeling the French people. The results of th are apparent in the wonderful way in which the F nch troops have stood up in this war.

"Germany handled the problem in her usual orough way. An investigation was begun in th universities. The president of the new univers in Frankfurt on the Main is authority for the stat ent that during the lunch hour most of the student ow drink buttermilk or a non-alcoholic beer 'I my day,' the president said, 'a student doing that uld be laughed at. Fortunately the times have cha ed.' The drinking bouts in the big universities hav o a large extent been abolished. The point is th the new crop of students realize themselves what ink amounts to. The movement was taken by th overnment gradually to eliminate drink from the my and navy and the entire civilian body. The em ror has been its champion. It is well known that has long since abolished liquors from his own tabl In his speeches at the naval and military schools has placed the ban upon alcohol as a beverage. He led on the navy officers at Kiel to eliminate drink f the good of their country. The emperor took this and because scientific investigation had brough the danger of alcohol in the national life to his atte on. Germany took this step long before the war an. In war and peace, it has led the fight against al ol. The most organic measure that we have on thi ubject has come from Germany. It is a law th at the birth of every child, the attending physic is required to give an alcohol card to the family. his card warns the parents to guard the infant again the effects of alcohol. Sobriety is today the rule the German army. After one of the big victories the East, General von Eichhorn's staff sat down a banquet. Most of the officers drank nothing the others had only a small glass of very light ne. This marks a tremendous step forward.

"IN America, General Nelson A. Miles and th ate General Howard were among the pioneers ho urged the elimination of alcohol from the ny. Colonel Maus of the Medical Corps, recently re ed, made elaborate investigations on the subject. ese covered a period of forty years. They were ma in the tropics as well as in the temperate zones. s a rest of his investigation, he urged the elimination of alcol.

n the navy, successive secretaries have taken actn until Secretary Daniels completed the eliminatio in all forms by abolishing the officers' wine mess. Daels has been severely criticized for this, but he dihe right thing. He was not ahead of his time, bu e did it just at the psychological moment, when weught to prepare to bring the efficiency of our offic up to the last notch physically. In 1887 Coress passed a law instigated by the Woman's Chtian Temperance Union. This law requires Anpolis and West Point to give lectures on the effec of alcohol and narcotics. The good of this is pren by the excellent type of men who are officers in e United States Army and Navy.

'robably the most conspicuous case of a nation's figl on alcohol is that of Russia. Under martial law was possible to eliminate drink. With an edict, voca was prohibited. Over night Russia went dry. The effs of this have been amazing. The difference in efficiey between the Russian army today and in the Japane war has surprised all neutral military observers.

"DRINK is closely tied up with the fate of nations. History tells us that Romulus founded Rome for a specific purpose—to get away from his neighbors and escape the effects of drinking. He announced that wine would never come within its walls. For over five hundred years Rome had absolute prohibition. A Roman woman was forbidden to drink wine under penalty of death. The efficiency of the Roman soldiers during that period is a marvel of military history. Rome's rise illustrates the value of sobriety and strength and integrity among her people. Then Rome started drinking and fell.

"Eight hundred German scientists, among them one hundred and sixty university professors, have recently issued a statement on alcohol, its effects on the human being, society, the nation and the race. Their conclusion is that 'alcohol is a protoplasmic poison; that it poisons the original protoplasms out of which all tissue or organic construction come, and that it is manifest that every function of the muscles or nerves must therefore be harmfully influenced from drink.'

"Alcohol is a habit-forming drug. It is an insidious poison which, with its anesthetic effect, hides real poison, that gradually undermines manhood and creates a craving of the tissues until manhood is mastered. It is a specific cause of degeneracy. It attacks with greater virulence the higher products of development, stops the building evolutionary processes of nature, and reverses the principle upon which all life is formed.

"The inefficiency due to drink in the living generation is multiplied many times over in loss for our coming offspring. Its continuance hastens general debauchery. That is why nations have perished and left only bleaching bones by the wayside. That is why one great power in Europe is going to fall, sooner or later, unless a halt is called. That is why, if we want to be prepared to face the most efficient nation of the world, no matter whether that nation be Asiatic or European, we must get down to business, eliminate the drink and give efficiency a chance.

"And that is why a vital part of the movement for preparedness sweeping over this country today should be directed against the saloons."

A Walk Up "Teapot Hill"

By REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK

President of Christian Endeavor

LT us walk up Teapot Hill together, to the great Buddhist temple which crowns its top. I venture to say we shall see more strange and interesting sights than we have seen in a 'wk of Sundays." To be sure, it is not Sunday whi we take this walk, but a midweek day; yet I 'eahe same sights and sounds would be heard on the irs lay of the week as on the second, third or fourth.

Tipot Hill and the Kyomidzu temple—the ancient apil and still the most sacred city of Japan, where the nperors are always crowned, and near which they are uried when their brief span of life and power is ove Moreover, Kyoto is the third city of the empire n opulation, with more than 00000 inhabitants, and for all hitian people it is of special ntest, because it is the seat of he oshisha University, the largst d most important Christian olle in the empire—the college ou ed by Dr. Neesima, that renaable native Christian, whose ian will be immortal in the nns of Japan.

F to begin the climb up Teapot ill. We take one of the fast roly cars to the foot of the hill, ndt once begin to rise in the vor between long rows of porceain hops on either side. Shop fte shop we pass, all of them pe o the street, and all of them ro ed with teapots and cups nd lates and platters and every ar y of china ware. I have said e ss them; but if there are any adi in our party, you may be urve do not pass them all, for o oman born could resist all hei temptations.

Ty are much alike, though iffent wares, including Imari, Kuti, Awata, Kyomidzu, and so ort are sold in different shops, ut hey are all attractive. As e ter, we see teapots before s d teapots behind us, teapots o right of us, teapots to left f t big teapots and little teapots, tall teapots and qu teapots, beautifully decorated teapots and evly plain teapots, teapots that you can buy for a en nd a half and others that would cost many gold olls; teapots covered with storks, herons, cherry los ms, chrysanthemums, wistaria, bamboo, and all on n the most exquisitely delicate tints and shades.

N wonder the foreigners christened this street 'eat Hill. I do not know what the Japanese name f t street may be. Of course there are many other eaiful and artistic wares in these shops—all kinds f dies, porcelain household goods, images and even od prominent among which is Daruma, a legless eit who tradition says sat still in meditation for nine ear until his legs fell off!

T familiar three monkey gods are also found dulic ed by the ten thousand in these shops, in assorted ize nd at prices to suit all customers. There is the lin monkey, the deaf monkey and the dumb money The blind monkey has his paws over his eyes hate may see no evil; the deaf monkey covers his ars ith his paws that he may hear no evil; and the un monkey covers his mouth that he may speak o il. No bad monkeys these—if we do not call he gods—to have in any household.

Y can have your choice of many other gods and f a ultitude of curios, but we will resist these temptatis and push our way up the hill, until we come to ne the most popular Buddhist temples in all Japan—the Kyomidzu temple. Hundreds of pilgrims crowd us on every side, all bound to pay their tribute of worship to one of the many gods which the temple contains. Let us watch them for a few moments. There is a pretty young girl standing before an image of Buddha. She seizes and pulls a long, twisted rope made of many strips of colored cloth. This strikes a gong, making a subdued tinkle, which calls the attention of the god to her prayer. Then, as though he had not wakened up to the importance of her petition, she claps her hands in an insistent way. Then she throws her prayer, written upon a slip of paper, at his feet, and after casting a copper coin of the value of half a cent into a big contribution box some eight feet square, she shuffles off on her wooden clogs, apparently satisfied that her prayer will be answered.

At the Kyomidzu temple she pulls a rope that strikes a gong, then claps her hands together and waits expectant

The great temple consists of many small shrines, each with its special deity in its inner recesses. There are, besides, two or three larger shrines. As we pass on, we come to a strange-looking wooden image that bears only a semblance to a human being. His nose is almost rubbed off; his eyes are scarcely visible, the sockets being all but gone; only fragments of his ears are left, and there is a large hole where his stomach should have been. Moreover, there are half a dozen bibs around his neck, a cotton hood on his head, and mitts on his hands. This is Benzuru, on whom Buddha is said to have conferred the power to heal all human ills. So poor people come to him from all the country around, and if they have a headache, rub their heads against his (though he is a blockhead) to cure it. If their eyes are bad, they rub his eyes with their fingers, and if they have indigestion they rub his stomach to cure their own. When they think they have been cured, or, perhaps, to propitiate him in advance, they make him presents of bibs and hoods and mitts and rice. Poor old, dilapidated Benzuru! He has been almost rubbed to pieces by his devout and suffering followers.

But the most pathetic shrine of all is occupied by two or three score of children's Buddhas, who are believed to cure all children's ailments, and here are many poor mothers who have come with offerings of rice and pennies, or with bibs to tie around Buddha's neck, in order that the dear little one at home may recover from croup or diphtheria, toothache or fever. At least a dozen mothers were there the day I visited Kyomidzu, and I could imagine the heartaches they brought with them for the sick little ones at home. My heart went out to them and I longed to have them know of Him who did not need to be propitiated with bibs or rice or pence, but who would still, as of old, take little children up in his arms and bless them.

At this shrine was a small boy with a dipper, pouring water on the head of a god, and another boy throwing little pebbles into the lap of another god. Perhaps these boys had sick little brothers or sisters at home, and were thus calling the attention of their particular god to the wants of their little playfellows. Most of the Buddhas in this shrine had a lap full of pebbles, and many of them were drenched from head to foot with water. Certainly, if anything could wake up an idol, such treatment would do it.

At another shrine a priest was selling fortunes for one sen (half a cent) apiece. The man who desired to know his fate shook a wooden cylinder violently until a little bamboo rod, six to eight inches long, dropped out of a small hole at one end. On this rod was a number, and on handing it to the priest and paying his sen the priest gave him a printed slip of paper bearing the corresponding number, on which his fortune was printed. Judging from his appearance, the man's fortune was a good one, for he went away alert and smiling.

If it were not for the hideous superstitions and idolatry connected with the temple, it would be a most attractive place to visit. The scenery all about is entrancing. Behind are great groves of solemn cryptomerias and camphor trees, with an occasional huge chestnut showing its silvery tassels. Below are beautiful gardens and lakelets and flowering shrubs. Scores of plum trees burst into full bloom in February and March, and hundreds of blossoming cherry trees make it still lovelier in April. Few more picturesque and charming spots can be found in all the world, but alas! the slimy trail of idolatry is over it all.

However Buddhism may be idealized and spiritualized, its actual results, as seen at such a temple, are anything but lovely. And yet there are some people in Christian lands who place Buddhism on a par with Christianity, and seem to find in it all the virtues of Christ's religion and a few more besides. Brethren of the Buddhist-Christian cult, is there not some better business to engage your time and your attention?

THE popular statesman, to meet all the requirements demanded of him, would need to be equipped like Briareus, with a hundred arms, that he might be a mighty hand-shaker, and with as many eyes as Argus, that he might see what was going on behind as well as in front. With such a make-up he would be able to keep his fences in order and to meet any reasonable emergency that might arise. But even then he would be tripped up at times through excess of efficiency, if for no other reason. After all, the people are not looking for a perfect man, but for a pretty good, all-round specimen of humanity with a little more talent than his fellows.

America for Peace!

OUR latest note to Germany, coming, in a sense, like a thunderbolt from a clear sky, has caused animated discussion throughout the country. Many see in it a presage of war; while others, remembering the "strict accountability" note of February, 1915, and its sequel, are disposed to regard the question of the German submarine warfare as possibly still within the domain of diplomatic negotiations. In his address to Congress and the nation on the same day, the President explained in detail the reasons which had impelled him to make a final appeal to Germany in the name of the neutral nations, and to call upon the Imperial German Government to immediately abandon its present methods of submarine warfare against passenger and freight-carrying vessels. Failure to comply with these demands, the note stated, would leave this Government no choice but to sever diplomatic relations with Germany altogether.

That this message has brought the nation face to face with the gravest situation since the war began is everywhere recognized. The speech to Congress deepened this solemn impression. It was felt that we stood on the brink of great events. Even the militarists were silenced for the moment. The great body of peace-loving Americans, who have accepted in good faith the President's repeated avowals of his desire to keep the country out of war by every possible means, were stunned and mystified by his course in sending such a message at all, while the Lusitania and Arabic cases—far more serious than any that have happened since—were dealt with by diplomacy.

To the friends of peace, the explanation vouchsafed to Congress that the evidence on which the message was based was cumulative, covering a long period of waiting in hope and expectation, meant but little. There was the message itself, indisputably a reversal of our former policies; an ultimatum that sounded like a challenge and an invitation to war. Reading the indictment, it might be gathered that Germany was the sole offender against the rights of neutrals, when in reality all know that the Allies have violated international law and transgressed against American rights on the seas many times with impunity, with never an ultimatum in sight.

The demand in the message to Germany is not for the entire cessation of submarine warfare, but for a change in the present methods of conducting it. In previous diplomatic exchanges, Germany gave virtual assurance that the dangers to neutrals through her submarine warfare would be reduced to a minimum. She is now asked in this new message, more peremptorily than before, to make good these promises to recognize international law and the rights of humanity in the conduct of her ocean warfare. There are reasons for regarding compliance as by no means improbable. Austria's attitude has been widely represented as favoring such a course, and the recent developments in Berlin, relative to changes in the von Tirpitz policy, in which Minister von Jagow and Chancellor Hollweg were active advocates, are cited as lending color to the promise of a possible change by the German Government.

In the event that the note should be unfavorably received in Berlin and the probability of a diplomatic break brought sharply into view, any action the President may take will be referred to the Foreign Relations Committees of both Houses, in accordance with the usual procedure when a breach is imminent. What proportion of the members believe a break with Germany justifiable at this time is uncertain, but it would surprise nobody if a majority were discovered favoring peace, and holding the view that there have been no recent international developments that would justify such a step at the present time.

Abraham Lincoln set a good example for later Presidents in inflexibly opposing all temptations to international war, unless the country was attacked under conditions which made resistance imperative. The record of American history shows that the disposition of the President has always been a vital factor in the issues of war and peace. There is a tremendous power in the hands of the executive, carrying momentous possibilities. That conservative journal, the New York Evening Post, commenting on the present situation in its issue of April 19, said: "The ultimate fact in the whole affair is that a President can, if he is so minded, present an issue of possible war to Congress in such a way that its independent right to declare war may be, in fact, overridden, or made to appear as if it did not exist."

This power, greater than that exercised by many monarchs, who have to submit all vital questions affecting the state to Parliaments and Councils, is one to be employed with rare wisdom and discretion. President Wilson's idealism and his well-known love of humanity are admirable in themselves. Yet circumstances may arise in which these very qualities may be the means of leading their possessor into dangerous paths. We recall his fervent utterances in behalf of neutrality and keeping America out of the war. Now, it would seem that these identical sentiments are transformed into an argument in favor of an opposite policy. For our people as a whole to enter fully and sympathetically into these views, as presented in the note to Germany, would be difficult if not impossible, knowing what their logical outcome would entail on the country. They regard any proposition that will lead us into this war as little short of madness, whether promoted by those in sympathy with the Allies or with the neutrals. It is opposed to all that we have stood for and proclaimed these twenty months past. Instead of augmenting the horrors of war, we should be trying to lessen them; instead of joining in the conflict, we should rather bend every energy to promote the cause of peace.

The Prophet's Room

AN old preacher, who has spent almost half a century in active Christian ministry, recently visited the scenes of his first successful pastorate. He preached in the old church—larger and more substantial now—and was welcomed by many who had been among his earliest converts. When the service was over and the greetings ended, a white-haired parishioner drew him aside. Many years before, this old man and his wife had been won to Christ by the ministrations of the visitor, and they recalled the fact in kindly and glowing words. "And now you must be our guest," they said, "for ever since you told us, in one of your sermons, about the prophet's chamber—the little room on the wall which the kind-hearted woman of Shunem fitted for Elisha—we have had just such a room in our house, and it's seldom empty." To resist such an appeal the old pastor found impossible; so he became their guest, and found the prophet's room a very haven of restfulness. In many homes where a fine, old-fashioned hospitality is observed, there is a prophet's room. Not an ordinary guest-chamber, but one that is set apart for very special service. However small and unpretentious it may be, however simple its furnishings, it is always scrupulously kept in order. And many a hard-working minister, traveling evangelist or humble, wayfaring Christian finds rest and comfort there. This is surely one of the most beautiful traits of hospitality, where all is given freely, without expectation of return. It is written that we should not forget to show kindness to strangers, "as thereby some have entertained angels unawares."

Undermining the Faith

THERE is presage of a coming battle royal among the theologians when the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church meets in Atlantic City on May 18. This conflict, which has long been brewing, has been brought to a focus by the recent action of the Presbytery of New York in relation to the standard of qualifications for the ministry. Its course in appointing candidates who hold the advanced views taught in Union Theological Seminary has aroused the conservative element among Presbyterians throughout the country. What is regarded as the most drastic step yet taken in the long controversy was the passage of a resolution in the Cincinnati Presbytery on April 17, by a vote of 42 to 29, petitioning the General Assembly to cut off the Presbytery of New York for its "long-continued disloyalty." This result was reached after a tempestuous session, in which the conservatives denounced in explicit language the defection of the New York Presbytery from the old faith, and especially for its attitude toward the Bible. The resolution, as adopted, reads:

> The Presbytery of New York being guilty of deliberate and long-continued disloyalty to the doctrinal studies of the Presbyterian Church, and being persistently disobedient to the mandates of the General Assembly, the Assembly is requested by the Presbytery of Cincinnati to take such steps as are necessary to cut off from the Presbyterian Church the Presbytery of New York, if no other method will avail.

Rev. Dr. Stephenson, of the Church of the Covenant, Cincinnati, the mover of the resolution, put the case very clearly when he said during the debate that candidates who rejected the cardinal doctrines of the faith could not be good ministers of the Gospel, and that pastors who, though claiming to be Christians and belonging to a Christian denomination, preached doctrines that were wholly outside of that faith, were guilty of "a crime that should not go unchallenged by loyal Presbyterians. For twenty years," he said, "the ministers of many of the ew York Presbyterian churches have been holdi up to ridicule the faith of our fathers. They say w hall not take drastic action against these men, be use the New York churches are our richest churche nd are heavy contributors. But I say, cast them ut! Let their money perish with them!"

Heresy-hunting has passed away long ago an will probably never return. Theology is progre ve. God is constantly and ceaselessly revealing hims to men, and every age brings new light. All c our Christian churches are broader than they were i the last generation. But there is not merely a diffe nce but a wide and irreconcilable divergence be een faith in the Bible facts of Christianity and th octrines that are taught in some of our seminarie nd preached in some of our pulpits today. We ust heartily agree with the loyal claim of the Cinc nati presbyters that the vital truths of Christianit are sacred, and should be taught in our Christian minaries and preached in every Christian pulpit nd that teaching or preaching which calls in questic the divine birth, the atonement and the resurrecti or holds the Bible and the old faith up to ridicule, s uld not be tolerated. A theological professor a an ordained minister are equally bound to teach all loyalty the doctrines of the church or denomi ion to which they are pledged, or else to take the nly honorable course open in such a case—retire fro the denomination and take their new theology to ree platform, where they may speak untrammeled.

Rum vs. Truth

THE temperance wave gathers height and th, wideness and strength. Cheering news nes from Russia that a bill will probab be passed making the prohibition decree perm ent and declaring that never again shall vodka o ny other strong alcoholic drinks be made and s in Russia. In America unexpected champions are t ing up the fight for temperance and the white portic on the temperance map are constantly growing larg nd more numerous.

A recent utterance of the Rev. Arthur J. B wn, D.D., a famous missionary leader, deals wit the liquor business in such powerful terms as to de rve frequent repetition and wide circulation:

> In my travels in foreign fields I learned that not or the customs of the people hinder missionary activities, but I nd the slime of the pit as represented in the American salo had been transferred to those fields. There is a brewery in J salem; there is a distillery on Mt. Lebanon; there are Am can saloons in Damascus. The saloon is the church's deadli foe in its foreign missionary work. The missionary goes to ristianize, while the rum-shop follows in his steps to dest his work, even to hurl the people back to a worse than h hen darkness.

It is the duty of the American church to in every possible way in the extermination of the s on. It hinders and undoes the church's work at ho , it tends to nullify its triumphs abroad. What ar ou doing in your town, your county, your state to h ten the end of this foe of all that is good?

Comment by the Way

IN the English House of Commons a few days ago, a m ber is reported to have said, "As there is nothing do in Christianity, why should not clergymen enlist?" M ing allowances for excitement due to existing condition the challenge implied in this ill-considered remark has been ken up by the evangelical press with great vigor. The Ch ian minister, it is urged, is the exponent of God's Word; hi uty is not to summon men to war, nor himself to take the rd, but to proclaim fearlessly that what the world needs to y is that the nations should repent of their sins. They a not fighting for Christianity, but against it. The war has no een the product of Christianity, but the result of the fail of Europe to acknowledge and obey its teachings. It shou not be forgotten, however, that very many good clergymen to be found with the armies, doing chaplain and evangelistic rk.

THE contention of specialists that there is a close rel onship between genius and certain forms of insanity uld seem to be borne out by the strange case of Blakelock, the ist, who after sixteen years' confinement in an asylum, was ken to New York a few days ago to see the paintings through ich he had become famous. In the Reinhardt galleries, wher ey were hung, he inspected a number of his now famous can es, but he specially lingered before a moonlight scene, wh he quietly proclaimed his masterpiece. It was recently purc sed for $20,000. The temporary return to the world of art ap ed to summon up all his perceptive faculties. He was aga he skilled, discriminating critic, and his observations on ner work than his own revealed a keenly judicial and appre ive mind, with a clear remembrance of individuals and eir methods. His visit was a remarkable illustration of a t porary return to lucidity. Now that he has gone back his retreat, the experts are watching to see whether the impr on will last. The little incident is a pitiful tragedy in a nu ell.

ear Without a Summer

I is said that the year 1816 had no summer; that frosts prevailed and ice formed in the month of June; that in July ice formed to the thick-nes of an inch; that in August there was, heavy fall of snow; but that in Sep mber the usual fall weather prevail . There was no corn raised, and mos of the crops were failures. It is saic hat these weather conditions exten d all over the New England states, Ne York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and hio. Probably the facts hav been exaggerated. Other par of the nation and world had summer, and there was foo and clothing for the people. Some growl perpetually at t weather; it is too hot or o cold; too wet or too dry And yet a kind Providen arranges it infinitely bett than we could. What b utiful promise this was n t early history of the race: "W e the earth remaineth, seed ne and harvest, and cold and eat, and summer and winter, d day and night shall not eas' (Gen. 8 : 22.)

enny Gambling

A instructor in geometry nd trigonometry in the igh chool at Marietta, Ohio, he er day resigned his position the request of the Board f ducation because he mat ed pennies with the stud ts. It is wise for a teac r to be democratic, to how and better still to feel de interest not only in the stud s, but also in the recreation and amusements of the scho rs. But care should be take not to become too much f a y, nor cheapen influence y much familiarity. Of ll p sons in the world, the teac r should be the last one to e er into the sins of youthful mes. The professor in the gh school indulged in an leg game with the boys. Inst d of teaching them by prec t and example that mat ing pennies is incipient gam ng, he really taught hem hat vice. Playing mar-es for keeps," putting up mon on cards in the dive, the ub room or the fashionable parlor, and betting a hundred thou nd dollars' worth of grain in the pit, or a hundred thousand dollars' wort of watered stock on the merchan' exchange, is the same vice. Mos of the people of this country belie in the law of value for value, and not break the law of God or man g mbling. The Roman soldiers gam ed for the Saviour's robes. "And they ucified him, and parted his garment casting lots." (Matt. 27 : 35.)

Elk for Adirondacks

A ERD of some seventy-five elk as been transferred from the Far Wes and turned loose into the game rese es of the Adirondacks. The elk is he largest of the deer family and o of the noblest of animals. In some countries deer are domesticated and tched to the sled. As a matter e nomy as well as sentiment, we ugh to preserve the elk and other food-roducing animals. The nation is waki up to the wrong, almost the crim of killing the forest trees, the song birds and wild animals we need for tr l sons and food. Game was a daily article of food at King Solomon's palace. "Besides harts, and roebucks, and fallow deer, and fatted fowl." (I Kings 4 : 23.)

Fed His Horse Sugar

A MAN stood on the corner of William and Fulton Streets, New York, the other day, paying no attention to the busy multitudes going either way past him, and talking only to his horse. He was a truckman with a chestnut sorrel horse and a wagon filled with barrels and boxes. He took a cube of white sugar out of a side pocket and gave it to the horse to eat. The animal's eyes looked almost human with gratitude. His master stroked his forehead and patted his neck and combed his mane with his fingers. Then the horse put his nose against the pocket that held the sugar and asked for more, and the man gave him another lump, and this went on several minutes. A passer-by stopped and watched the performance for some time, and then said to the driver: "You are feeding sugar today in spite of the high price of food." "Yes," said the man, "he gets this kind of treatment every day. I own the truck and the horse. He is my companion as well as my stock in trade. I have owned him fifteen years. No better horse ever had a harness on him. He has supported me and helped me bring up my children. He seems like a member of my family. I stop about this time every day and give him sugar. He likes it and knows I love him when I give it to him. He loves me, too, I am sure of that, and he has cute ways of telling me so." The man who had halted to witness this scene on the busy thoroughfare said: "Your horse looks as though he belongs to a rich man's coach on Fifth Avenue." "Yes," replied the owner, "his hair is as soft as silk, and I brush it as carefully as a man would his Sunday coat. He is as fat as butter. I would miss a meal any time rather than let him go hungry. This last snow went hard on him and he fell off some, but when the ice got off the streets he picked up his flesh again. He looks like a three-year-old, but he is twenty-five. There will be some crying among the youngsters when he dies. I am going to keep him till he dies. I wouldn't want to sell a member of the family, you know." This is an ideal picture of a driver and a horse. Dumb animals know when we are good to them, and answer love with love. The law justly lays its hand on the human brutes that kick or maim or lash or mistreat them. The incident calls to mind that fact that "a righteous man regardeth the life of his beast." (Prov. 12 : 10.)

Red Cross Motor Ambulances for Russia

FIFTEEN motor ambulances, the gift of Americans to the Red Cross Society of Russia, paraded up Fifth Avenue, New York City, the other day on their way to the battle front. The demon of war goes ahead with his weapons of destruction; the angel of mercy follows in his bloody track. These motor ambulances are not the first aid the United States has sent to Russia; our Red Cross rendered important help to the famine-stricken in Russia in 1891. How humane, how Christlike is the work of ministering to the sick, suffering, wounded, dying and dead! How revolting is the thought that war greedily welcomes so beneficent a service that many wounded men may be able to plunge again into the maelstrom of hate! The prayer of the universal heart is that the war may end, that the hints of peace may grow into actual fact, that the implements of war may be turned into those of industry, and that the ambulances may be changed into wagons of trade, conveyances of mercy and cars of salvation, in accordance with this prophecy: "And they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks; nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." (Micah 4 : 3.)

Boy Rewarded for Bravery

A BRONZE medal and a purse of twenty-five dollars in gold were presented recently to Paul Monohan, son of John Monohan of Hunter's Point, by the Life Saving Association of New York. Paul rescued John Gallagher from drowning in the East River on July 21, 1914. The hero was a little fellow only eleven years old, and the playmate he rescued was only nine. It makes one think more of his race to see this illustration of heroism on the part of the little boy not yet in his teens. He knew the risk to his own life in going into the river, but his impulse to save his friend was stronger than his love for himself. There are hundreds of thousands of such heroes among the boys and girls of our land who do not have any medals awarded them, nor an item of notice in the newspapers. All such acts should inspire us with greater zeal and courage in saving the bodies and souls of others. Every nation of the earth has moral heroes, men and women who have given up their lives to the salvation of the souls of others at great personal risk to themselves, and all in imitation of the spirit of the Master, of whom it was said: "For the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." (Luke 19 : 10.)

Protecting the Young

THE magazine Popular Mechanics gives a description of ingenious covers which are being used in the fields of southwestern California by truck gardeners and others for shielding delicate young plants from frosts and freshets. The individual covers are pressed into shape from blank disks made of a light flexible material which is waterproof. The task of setting them is simple, requiring little labor. They are first laid over the plants, and their bottom edges are then pressed into loose earth by means of a hand implement and held securely. Two men working together, it is said, can distribute and anchor several thousand in a day's time. Since they are opalescent material, they care for the young plants in mild weather as if the plants were set in greenhouses. By employing them growth is hastened, losses guarded against, and the chances for early crops increased. How necessary to protect young life, so delicate and defenseless! God tells the hen when the hawk is near or the storm is coming, that she may gather her chickens under the soft shelter of her wings. He has instituted home and a Christian motherhood and the church and the Sunday school to shelter the children from enemies that would kill, to keep away the deadly frost, to let in the sunlight of heaven, and to promote mental and spiritual growth. Christ teaches the divine shelter for souls by this illustration of the protection of young life from harm: "How often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!" (Matt. 23: 37.)

Set Clocks Ahead

THE German Federal Council passed a measure providing that on May 1 all clocks should be set ahead one hour. The measure was proposed for hygienic and economic reasons, as lengthening working time during daylight and decreasing the necessity for artificial light. There is this account of the changing of the indicator of the timepiece, but it was turned backward instead of forward on the sun dial, which was the clock of olden times: "And he brought the shadow ten degrees backward, by which it had gone down in the dial of Ahaz." (II Kings 20:11.)

Our Chinese Orphans in War Time

It is a wonderful story of divine protection amid many perils, and of splendid progress in the orphanage training work, which is told in the letters from our missionaries in China, from which we give extracts in this issue. While Europe has its great war, China has its widespread revolution. Our Christian Herald friends who founded and fostered this beautiful work of rescue and child-training will be glad to learn not only of the safety of their young protégés, but of the progress the orphanage work is making all along the line.

There are now in the twenty-five orphanages in sixteen cities a total of 703 boys and girls, according to the latest figures received from Treasurer Maurice J. Walker of the Christian Herald Orphanage Committee at Chinkiang—the central organization having supervision of the entire work. Remittances of the funds contributed by the readers of this journal, who have been the loyal supporters of the work for a number of years past, are made quarterly by the Christian Herald to the Treasurer at Chinkiang and apportioned by the Committee among the various orphanages. The work has been greatly blessed in many ways. It began with 2,000 little waifs, orphans and half-orphans. A large number of the children are now true Christian converts. Many have been trained as pastors, evangelists, and Bible readers, while hundreds of others have been equipped for self-support as farmers, gardeners, mechanics and in other useful vocations. The training schools established in connection with the orphanages have won the admiration and confidence of the best class of Chinese. The results of the work, as a whole, constitute the strongest possible appeal in behalf of Christianity, and have exerted a splendid and far-reaching influence throughout China, and will long continue to do so.

In dealing with the missio ries' presentation, we begin with the le r of Rev. Otto E. Oberg of the atsi Orphanage, North China, whic was written in a time of great peril. Mr. Oberg says:

"FROM the beginning of this ear, we have been shut up by ro ers, who entered the city January 1 an ept it for five days. On the 5th of the nth the government troops arrived outside the wes ate. Once again we had a day of war in Sarats and fiercer than before. The explosions of shells vere horrible. Afterward we found that no less tha four shells had come into our compound; but still one was hurt. God is our refuge! When the robbers ame on January 1, the mandarin and the official led. Some officials and others went to the mission tion for shelter. The robbers began their work of de ruction in the yamen right opposite our mission s ion, by shooting and by robbing and burning the ses, and they continued with the shops. We were t in peace here in the mission station on the firs lay. When some of the robbers prepared to attack us, hers

A group of lovable, teachable, ambitious Chinese lads who are headed straight for Christian service because of the love and pity of Christian Herald readers i erfered, saying 'This is Jesu tang' or 'iang tang,' a these words were effective to turn the robbers a y. But when we had passed the first day of the n year, they did not hesitate from entering even o private rooms, demanding guns, rugs and other t gs. As a rule, the robbers were not allowed by t ir chief to hurt or rob 'Jesu tang,' and in some cases w were protected by Chinese robbers from being k ed and hurt by Mongolian robbers. What we lost w a comparatively small matter, when we think o how many of the heathen have been despoiled. S e officials were found by the robbers, and one of t m had his tongue cut off and his mouth cut up to t ears, while he was told, 'You have been fond of g d meat; eat now.'

On the evening of January 5 the robbers sent a m sage asking me to go with the leading merchants o side the west gate and request the government t ops to withdraw, adding that if we did not do so t city would be burnt. After a few minutes the m chants came in here among us to escape the r ers. We were at this time facing a severe trial. T merchants were now more than willing to kneel d n in prayer. After our prayer, the r er chiefs returned, threatening to burn o town if we could not stop the war. We c d hear the sound of the firing of the guns i e streets. Out went the robbers for the la time, and a few minutes later the gov- e nent soldiers came in through our gate. T Lord had answered our prayer, and w fell down on our knees, together with t merchants, and gave thanks to God for hi nercy!

It may be of special interest to the fr ds and patrons of our orphans to know th during those five days, while the ro ers were looting and maltreating the pe le in many ways, our orphanages were le entirely in peace. Not even a knock by th robbers on the door was heard. The so iers have, in some respects, not behaved so ell as even the robbers. The latter did n once fire a gun in our compound, but th soldiers fired several times. They ro ed the people in the streets just as the ro ers did. Still, we were thankful to God th the troops came. When their general he d that the soldiers were looting, he w out into the street himself and shot a ro ing soldier, and the punishment had a od effect."

MISS EMILY S. HARTWELL of the Christian Herald Fukien Industrial H es (interdenominational) writes from F how: "We cannot express to you on half the gratitude we feel for all your he for the orphans and destitute in this province. We thank you for the new patrons secured for us this year. I have sent to our patrons twice a year some reports of the work of the Homes. Our list still remains at 100 children. During the past year we have received a little over $4,000 (Mex.) from Chinese sources, of which $1,200 has come from the government and $1,200 from the Salt Bureau. The high officials looked into the industrial exhibit with great care, and expressed unfeigned pleasure at the work of the Homes on all lines. The Homes will certainly become a wonderful institution and a glory to Christian Herald patrons."

Superintendent H. C. Bartel of the Tsaohsien Orphanage, North China, sends a special letter to the Christian Herald readers, "and all who so kindly assist in the Christian Herald China Relief Fund." He speaks most encouragingly of the results already accomplished. "Our children are faithfully taught the Scriptures along with their other duties. They readily memorize many portions of the Bible, songs, and so forth. About three hundred children have been taken into this orphanage. We have been permitted to see some precious fruits of our labor, in the conversion of a goodly number of our older boys and girls. Many of these boys and girls (young men and women now) are giving their whole time to preaching the Gospel; and others, as they go back to their native villages, witness to the saving power of Jesus. This has a great effect on the people, as they hardly recognize in this clean, bright, well-trained boy or girl the little half-starved child who left their village a few short years before. Words fail us to express our gratitude toward those who have helped in this grand work, and we sincerely hope a reflex blessing may come to all who have thus assisted. Will you not continue to help us carry on this work for the Master, for soon will come the time when gold and silver will be of no value to us? Now is the time to have it exchanged for eternal value."

Miss Sally M. Laey, a missionary at the Tsingkiangpu (Presbyterian) Orphanage, writes: "Our boys are all well, and making fair progress along all lines. We have some very bright, promising boys, who we hope may be future Christian workers. The majority, of course, must be trained to support themselves by some form of industrial work. This training we are trying to give them, and many have already secured very good positions.

"Please remember these boys in your prayers. They are surrounded by so many temptations in this heathen land, that they need all the help that Christian prayer can give them. We thank you for your interest in the work."

A number of additional patrons are needed for our Chinese orphans. At several of the missions there are children unprovided for, and as the burden of their support cannot be borne by the missionaries, especially at the present time, we appeal to those who are interested in the welfare, spiritual and material, of those little ones to aid in the work. Twenty dollars provides for a whole year's care, shelter, food, training and clothing of a boy or girl at any of the orphanages. Smaller gifts, however, are always welcome. The protégé, if sufficiently trained, is put into communication with the patron, and writes letters at regular intervals. This phase of the work furnishes an attractive opportunity for churches, Sunday school classes, missionary societies, Christian Endeavorers and similar organizations to get into actual touch with missionary effort and to imbibe the missionary spirit.

All contributions in aid of the Chinese Orphans should be sent to the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.

"George Harris" in Mexico

By J. F. DERRICK

ast week we published under the title "Simon L ee in Mexico" the first half of this account of labor co itions which are said to prevail in some sections of exico, describing the inhuman debt bondage. The C stian Herald has published an article describing si ar conditions under which sisal hemp is said to be gr n in Yucatan. Commenting on the present story, M Charles Stelzle, who has studied Mexican conditions, sa "The practices described in this manuscript are su y not of common occurrence even in Mexico. The ge al situation among the Mexican peons is extremely ba Living conditions are wretched. However, I wo d question whether the story presents a typical situatio . . . I am sure, however, that the printing of thi story, with modifications, perhaps, would serve a y useful purpose—it would show the terrible conditio among the lower class of working people in Mexico. an hat what is needed most of all in that country is the em cipation of the great masses who are practically hel in slavery on account of their extreme poverty." (I have modified the story considerably.)

e sober statement that human beings are subjected to ch treatment as is depicted in these two articles, in a ighboring state, should prompt sober thought as to the uty of the Christian church and a Christian nation to at the truth and to end such conditions by exposing hem to the light of public knowledge and the indigna n of public opinion.—The Editor.]

ABOUT eighty per cent. of these people seemed content with their lot, and got over the brutal treatment accorded them, for it seemed natural to forget, but the remaining twenty pe cent. rebelled against the treatment and were co antly trying to effect an escape. It must be re nbered that each individual represented cash, an vas carried on the books as an asset.

hen a worker became too incorrigible, when wh pings, weeks in shackles without food save water an corn bread once a day, and other barbarities fai l to reconcile him to his lot, negotiations were at on started to effect a sale to another "employer." e proposed purchaser would go over the man's account, and the amount against the individual was always the basis for negotiation. This account would be bought out at face value. So whenever a poor wretch was sold he gained nothing, for he started to work for his new master with a debt of several hundred dollars against him. This method formed an endless chain, connecting all plantations. The existing close relationship maintained made it not only difficult, but extremely dangerous, for any one to contemplate escape; and not a man was without this knowledge, yet he would try it from sheer desperation. Probably it was this knowledge that imposed a resigned disposition upon the remaining eighty per cent.

TIME passed on. One evening, I was sitting outside of the office talking with the bookkeeper after a hard day's work. Our conversation was interrupted by the galloping of horses outside of the enclosure. In a few minutes everything was alive. There was the hurrying to and fro of men, with ropes, and armed to the teeth. Although I had seen much, this was new to me. I asked what was the trouble, and was told that two men had escaped with an advantage of two days. The master was out giving orders how to proceed. All was excitement and bustle, and with reason; for if those two fellows, whose identity I learned later, reached the capital, there would most certainly be trouble, for they would make known to the authorities at that place the conditions as they existed. Not only were these two wise in getting away, but they were intelligent enough to tell a straight story, and cunning enough to plan a coup, and so destroy this brutally depraved and immoral institution. One destroyed and bankrupt, the others must have fallen.

Letters had been sent to various persons, putting them on the lookout, and the hunting party mounted and rode away into the night.

The fugitives certainly knew that they would be sought, and they also knew what would happen to them if caught. What a state of terror those two souls must have suffered! Sleeping in the woods, exposed to all kinds of venomous snakes, the Mexican tiger and lion; starting at every crack of a bush, with hearts leaping at what seemed to them a stealthy tread! How I did pity them!

Daylight came, but no tidings. The situation was tense. No one dared to discuss the matter at all. Even that class who were immune did not care to venture an opinion on the situation; but they were frank enough to admit that they were in sympathy with the escaped men.

Days passed. A week brought the intelligence that the men had been cornered. This news was welcomed, and additional instructions were dispatched by courier. From what I could gather, the two men had declared that they would fight to the death before they would be captured and brought back to what they rightly termed an inferno.

The owners of other estates began to come around to offer assistance. It was whispered around that the authorities in surrounding towns had heard of the matter and were becoming interested. These miserable owners were worried. As a result of the several conferences a sort of reunion on a certain day on each of the neighboring plantations was devised; a free intermingling among the workers—a thing never before heard of. This was, of course, to be done under the supervision of the major-domo, whose vigilance was never relaxed for a moment. The round of fun-making began during the third week following the escape. Each slave was given money. In aggravated cases, five dollars were given. These amounts were not carried against them, and they were told so. They were urged to have a good time. This cunningly devised scheme was ostensibly for the purpose of turning the tide of sentiment if possible. These poor people from observation were not so innocent or ignorant as their masters supposed, for I often heard comments upon the occasion that were surprising. One fellow, who was having a "glorious time," having partaken very freely of aguardiente, seeing me, called to me, and running up hat in hand said to me, "Habrá el amo soñado?" ("Has the master dreamed?")

Something New in Muffins

One of Marion Harris Neil's Recent Dainty Creations

4 tablespoonfuls Crisco
¼ cupful sugar
1 teaspoonful salt
1 cupful scalded milk
1 cupful boiling water
1 yeast cake
¼ cupful lukewarm water
2 eggs
4 cupfuls flour
[Use level measurements]

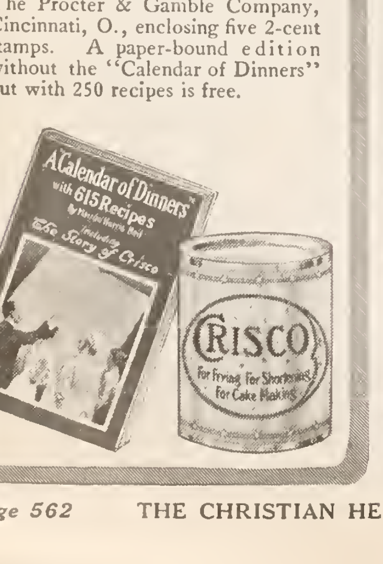
Add Crisco, sugar and salt to scalded milk and boiling water. Cool to lukewarm. Add yeast cake after it has been broken up and dissolved in ¼ cupful lukewarm water, and beaten eggs. Beat well and add flour gradually until all has been used. Beat thoroughly, coyer and let rise until double its bulk. This will take about two hours. Beat down, fill well Criscoed muffin rings placed on hot Criscoed griddle, and brown on one side. Remove ring, turn and brown on other side. Serve hot.

CRISCO
For Frying-For Shortening
For Cake Making

Crisco is so pure and delicate that the real appetizing tastes are brought out even in the simplest foods. There is unusual daintiness and richness about all dishes in which it is used.

Crisco, the cream of vegetable oil, is of such uniform, high quality that efficient housewives everywhere depend upon it in the preparation of all foods requiring a cooking fat.

Send for "A Calendar of Dinners" which, besides the Story of Crisco, contains 365 dinner menus and 615 recipes tested by Marion-Harris Neil, the cooking authority. It is a handsome, cloth-bound, gold-stamped book, illustrated and interesting. Write for it addressing Dept. S-5, The Procter & Gamble Company, Cincinnati, O., enclosing five 2-cent stamps. A paper-bound edition without the "Calendar of Dinners" but with 250 recipes is free.



A Town of Tents and Shacks

CONTINUING FRANK G. CARPENTER'S ALASKA STORY

Copyright, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

I HAVE come from Sunrise to Anchorage. Sunrise is the little, log cabin, mining settlement on the northern end of the Kenai Peninsula. Anchorage is the frontier town of cabins and tents that has grown up at the mouth of Ship Creek, on the mainland at the beginning of the new construction of Uncle Sam's railroad. The railway really begins at Seward at the southern coast of the Kenai Peninsula, but its tracks for seventy-two miles will be those of the Alaska Northern, which Uncle Sam has bought ready built. The work now under way is from Anchorage northward.

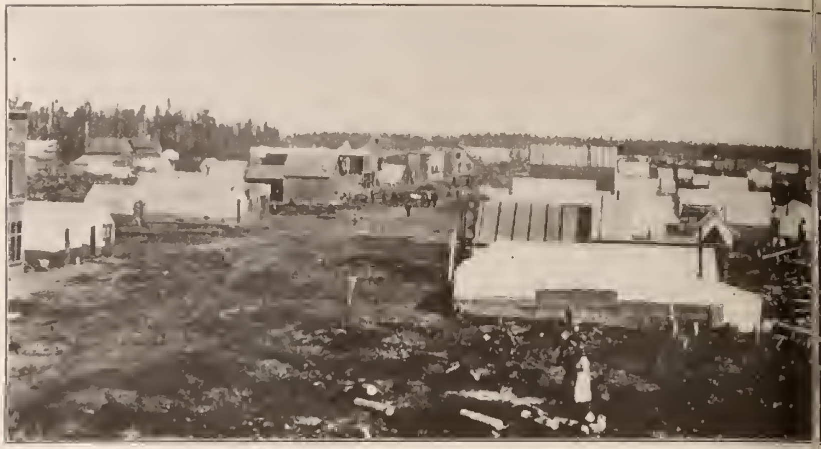
The reason for Anchorage is the railroad construction, and it sprang into being when the President, as Aladdin, rubbed the rusty old lamp of Congress and wished for that appropriation of $35,000,000 for railroads in Alaska. The town will be the nearest port to the Matanuska coal fields, and when navigation in Cook Inlet is open, which is from five to seven months of the year, it will have, perhaps, the bulk of the coal trade. For the rest of the time it will go on to Seward. It is for this reason that the people here expect a big city at Anchorage. They look forward to it as a smelting and manufacturing center as well as a great commercial port, and are already talking of it as the financial heart of Alaska.

The people of Seward are jealous of Anchorage. They claim that their port will be the only real city at the southern end of the railroad, for the reason that Resurrection Bay is free of ice all the year round, and ships can land there at any hour of the year. All steamers coming to Anchorage have to go several hundred miles farther. They must come up Cook Inlet, which is a great bay on the west of the peninsula, extending about 200 miles into the land. The inlet in places is upward of fifty miles wide, but it narrows at the northern end, and is only a few miles across in Knik Arm, where Anchorage is situated. The lower part of the inlet, owing to the warm Japanese current, is open throughout the year. The upper part freezes along in October or November, and for a great part of the winter ships cannot come in. The place is one of high tides. The sea rises from forty-five to sixty-five feet in the arms of the inlet, and it rushes in twice a day in a wall forming a bore of somewhat the same nature as those in the Bay of Fundy or in the Hoogly River, up which one goes to Calcutta.

I had some experience with the tide in coming from Sunrise to Anchorage. We had to leave when the waters were high, and this was not until midnight. Our boat was a launch about eighteen feet in length, with a twelve-horsepower gasoline engine taking up the whole of the center. There were bench seats around the side, and only a canvas for cover. The owner of the boat was a German storekeeper of Sunrise, and the engineer was his son, a boy of eighteen. The man refused to go unless he got at least $30, but we managed to drum up seven passengers, consisting of myself, Mr. George Parks of the government land office, and five prospectors.

The distance we made was something like 100 miles. It took us about eight hours to go, and the German was over six days coming back. We rode out of Turnagain Arm to Fire Island, and lay there for an hour to avoid the rough water. We then came on through Knik Arm to Ship Creek, and had to wait several hours before the tide rose so that we could land. This was so, notwithstanding our boat drew but three feet of water. We might have taken a dory and tramped to the shore through the mud, but the mud here is of a blue glacial clay and as sticky as glue. It is almost impossible to walk through it. The steamers usually anchor some distance from shore, and all freight is landed in lighters taken in by tugboats. The government wharf is high up on piles, and there are platforms a little below the floors of the warehouses upon which the lighters are anchored. They come in when the tide is high, and as it falls are upheld by the platforms so they can be unloaded at leisure.

But let me give you some pictures of this new city which has sprung up in a night at the end of Uncle Sam's railroad. Ship Creek has built up here a low valley perhaps two or three thousand feet wide and bordered on each side by steep bluffs. The tops of the bluffs are comparatively level, and they run far back into the country. The land was originally covered with woods, and the new settlements have been cut out of the trees. The lowlands near the creek have been reserved by the government for the use of the railroad, and they will be the site of the freight yards and terminals. The bluff to the right, as you face the town from the sea, is where the new city is now going up. It contains the homes and business establishments of the settlement. The bluff on the left is the official resi nce section. It has many pretty cot ges built in the groves, and remind one a little of a summer resort.



The main street of Anchorage, a town of cabins and tents

It is easy to see the enormous ork that has already been done in sta ing the railroad. The lowlands, whic are to be used for government term als were a dense forest carpeted with tic moss, which in places was severa eet deep. The trees had to be cut nd the stumps taken out. The mos as burned away and the ground smo ed up for the tracks and the buil gs. The whole of this section is now co ed with tracks. There are great pil of lumber standing about here and re. Ties are laid up like cordwood, and ere are steel beams and rafters and all rts of structural material. There are les of steel rails. The machinery om Panama has begun to arrive, and co-motives and steam shovels are s ld-ing about. A great deal of dre ng will have to be done to make the h bor fit for the railroad, and some o he Panama dredges will probabl be brought to Ship Creek.

There are a number of govern nt buildings on this lowland. All are f a temporary nature, the big ma ne shops and other structures being eft for the future. The government st les are great tents hundreds of feet ng in which rude stalls of poles have en made for the horses. One of the st-looking buildings is the hospital. is of two stories and is made of logs It stands near the harbor facing nik Arm.

And now let us visit the tow on the bluffs. People began to settle re before the government came, and ey built hundreds of tents and sl ks where the railroad tracks are. Th n-gineers changed the site of the wn to the highlands. They set asi a tract of 340 acres for the town ite and plotted out streets and lots, v-ing certain squares for schools nd municipal buildings. They cut he trees from one hundred acres and cl ed the streets and roads so they were f or use. They then sold the lots at ıc-tion, subject to the cost of the ar-ing, each lot being assessed from 10 to $20 for the work upon it and he street in front. This was done a ut the middle of last July. At that ne the site of the whole town wa on fire. Stumps and logs were everyw re burning. The arctic moss was ab ze, and it was impossible to go ove he country without burning your boc

A little later the first auction as held and the first lots were sold. ix hundred and fifty-five were dispos of the first week, and they broug in $150,000. The total number of lo is 1,407, and the number set aside fo he city and government reservatio is ninety-three.

The streets are sixty feet wide nd the alleys twenty feet. About e-third of the town site has been cle d, and this includes something like seven miles of streets and roadways.

Come with me to the third floor of the hotel, near the bluff, at the western end of Anchorage, and look at the city as it lies here today. The town is only a few months old and it is still in the tent and shack stage. There are stumps everywhere black with the smoke and the burning. Here and there men are splitting the stumps and digging them out by the roots. Building is going on everywhere.

Now turn your head and face the main street. It is eighty feet wide and frame buildings and tents now line it on both sides for more than a mile. That little cottage half way down the north side is the city post office and the tent across the way with the auctioneer's stand outside it is the city hall, where the mayor holds forth. On both sides of the main street hundreds of houses and tents are scattered here and there through the stumps. There are side streets with stores on them, and carpenters and cabinetmakers have their shops with pretentious signs over them.

All kinds of business have already started. Right near us is a new clothing store. It is a one-story shed, with trousers, coats and long rubber boots hanging by nails to the wall. The white canvas sign in front is so big that it covers half of the building, hiding the roof. A little farther on is a mattress factory, consisting of a tent, with a stovepipe running high above the canvas. The tent has a board floor, and the mattresses are piled high upon it. There is no front to the tent, and the dust blows in on the goods.

A little farther on is a jewelry establishment, half tent and half house, and down that street at the side is a big queensware store, with crockery and all sorts of porcelain piled up outside. There are dry goods stores and drug stores and stores selling notions. There are many provision stores and hardware stores and stores that sell books and newspapers. The town has a printing office and a newspaper of its own.

The "Two Girls' Waffle House" is owned by two bright-eyed young women from Seattle, who came to Anchorage when the town was first started and opened an eating-place on the flats. When the town was moved to the hills they put their house on a wagon and dropped it down here. In the front is a rude counter, covered with an oilcloth, at which the customers sit. There is room for just eight, but the counter is always filled at mealtime, and there are often men waiting outside. One of the girls cooks the meals while the other waits on the table and takes in the cash. They will serve you an order of waffles hot from the griddle, with good butter and sirup and a cup of coffee on the side, for 25 cents; or if you will you may have ham and eggs and coffee for a half dollar.

There are many women in business at Anchorage. Some are typewriters, others clerks in the stores and some have stores of their own. There is a woman barber on Fourth Street, and one of the best dry goods and notion establishments is kept by a girl under thirty, whose hair is as red as the brightest goods on her shelves. She is pretty. Another young lady has come here from Mendota, Ill., to open a millinery establishment. Another is a trained nurse, who came from a hospital in Philadelphia.

The owner of the "White House" hotel is a business woman, who is known everywhere throughout the northwest. It was Mrs. White's daughter, popularly known as "Babe" White, who drove the first spike for the railroad, and Babe was, I think, the first white child born in this region.

Mrs. White was the first white womman to settle on the northern shores of Cook Inlet. She came to Alaska twenty years ago as the wife of a sea captain who was then sailing as far north as Bering Sea. She and her husband settled on the shores of Cook Inlet. She made the first American flag that was ever floated north of that inlet. It was shortly after she had established her trading station. She wanted a flag to show her patriotism and also to signal the ships. In her stock of goods she had plenty of white and blue cloth, but looked in vain for red for the stripes. At last one day she saw an Indian woman passing who had on a red petticoat. She called to her and bought the petticoat, and that made the stripes.

Anchorage is less than a year old but it already has its social life and amusements. On the hill to the north is a tennis court and down in the government reservation is a baseball ground, so made that it can be flooded and turned into a skating rink during the winter. The town has its parties and dances, and on the last Fourth of July it held a baseball match in which a team made up of the girls competed with one formed of the boys. The town has its commercial club, with something like 200 members, and this consists of women as well as of men. I attended one of the meetings. The people were enthusiastic, and they seemed unanimous in their votes for municipal improvements, such as telephones, electric lights, and better means of protection from fires. They are all democratic, and so far the best of civic spirit seems to prevail.

Girls Who Make Good

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

The Girl Who Conquered Herself

RUTH always had an ungovernable temper. I have known Ruth a long while—we played dolls together, and made mud pies, and divided our candy, and so I really know. I am perhaps her very first friend. Of course, her real name is not Ruth; but I am rather sure that it would be unfair to tell her real name.

My first memory of Ruth's temper is a bit dim, for we might have been five years old, we two, at the time. I remember that I owned a black-faced, woolly-headed doll, and I remember that she wanted it for her own. Because I was not the giving-up kind—primarily, however, because I loved the doll—I refused to give it up, whereupon Ruth threw a stone at me. It was a large, sharp stone, and it made an ugly-looking, jagged little cut on my forehead. I remember how the blood dripped down the side of my face.

Ruth was aghast at the mischief she had done. I can see her now, her chubby baby hands clasped in front of her eyes to shut out the sight of the blood. At my wails someone came to me and washed my face, and put sticking-plaster on my forehead. I was kissed and petted and given a peppermint stick. But most of all (and this memory is a very real one), I can see Ruth's small stricken face, and I can hear her voice saying:

"I didn't mean to! I didn't mean to hurt her! The stone frew itself."

My forehead was nearly well the next day. In a week the scar of it was quite gone. But it was a long time before the scared look was entirely driven from Ruth's eyes.

WE went right on being friends. A hastily flung rock or a cut forehead is a small thing to a really true child-friendship. But, though we continued to be friends, we saw less and less of each other as the years went on. We were well past the doll and mud pie stage, and we were living in different towns and going to different schools and having different interests in life, and different friends. But occasionally we visited. It was on one of my visits to her home that I again saw her lose her temper. It was when her small brother spilled a cup of chocolate on her new dress. I'll admit that she had provocation, for it was a wonderful dress; but little brother hadn't meant to spill the chocolate.

Ruth was a pretty girl. She is still a pretty girl, for she has a great mass of

Comfort Tires, Protected Against Blow-out

GOODYEAR Cord Tires ride with utmost comfort. Their great oversize combines the added cushion of an increased air-volume with the natural liveliness of Goodyear cord construction.

They are protected from stone-bruise and blow-out because they are built of flexible cords without cross-weave, so that they yield to impact with road obstructions.

Goodyear Cord users find these advantages, and the long mileage due to the character of the tire, worth far more than the difference in price.

Goodyear No-Hook Cord Tires are fortified against:—

Rim-cutting—By our No-Rim-Cut Feature.

Blow-outs—By our On-Air Cure.

Loose Treads—By our Rubber Rivets.

Puncture and Skidding—By our Double-Thick All-Weather and Ribbed Treads.

corn-colored hair and the bluest eyes I ever saw. She had a mouth that looked like the first rosebud of June. But, though Ruth is a pretty girl, I was glad I was not her little brother that day when he spilled the chocolate on her gown. Her blue eyes grew as hard and as cold as ice—as ice with some dark fire glowing behind it—and her rosebud mouth straightened out until it looked like a thin crimson gash on her face. I saw her hand clutch convulsively on the air, and then all at once the little brother gave a queer gasp and ran out of the room. I didn't blame him at all, for, strangely, at that moment I remembered an angry baby face and a wildly flung stone. And across the years that divided my little childhood from my big girlhood, the hurt of my cut forehead came back to me.

And then in a moment Ruth's clutched hand unfolded, and her lips parted in a cold smile that was almost a sneer.

"The dress will wash," I ventured, half frightened.

"Yes," said Ruth. And then suddenly she picked up a cup—an empty chocolate-cup of very fine china—and threw it down—hard—on the floor. I watched, dazedly, as it shattered into a hundred bits. And then Ruth burst into sobs, and ran from the room. Up stairs I could hear her bedroom door slam and the lock snap.

I stood alone in the room, looking at the fragments of the cup, and as I stood there her little brother came strolling back.

"Did Ruth—throw that?" he questioned, pointing to the pieces. And then, before I could answer, he grinned in an apologetic small-boy way.

"Ruth's a dandy girl, usually," he told me. "She's an awful nice girl. But when anything makes her mad—whew! She's just awful. She screams an' cries, an' throws things. An' she doesn't care who she hits. She's always sorry—after—but she can't seem to help actin' like she does!"

Ruth was up stairs the rest of the day with a bad headache. The next day she was down early, singing as she dusted the rooms. But her face was pale, and her eyes were a bit scared.

WE grew up even more, from the big-girl stage to young ladies with their hair up. We had left school. I was launched in the business world, doing the work I love to do, when Ruth announced her engagement. Her fiancé was a Western man, and she had not known him for a very long time. She had never met any of his relatives, but she wrote me that his father, who was a famous surgeon, was going to spend a week in the city, and that she was going to give a dinner for him.

"I'll be coming into town the day of the dinner," she wrote, "and if you'll meet me in the station we'll go up together. I want to get there before Bob's father comes. I want him to see me looking my best."

And I said I would come to the dinner and meet her wherever she wanted me to.

I went to the station, and though it was not long before train time, Ruth was nowhere to be seen. I waited nervously, for I remembered that she wanted to get home early—that she wanted "Bob's father to see her at her best." And then at last, just as the iron gates had slammed shut—just as the whistle of the train had tooted for the last time, Ruth dashed into the station, her face scarlet from running, her hat on one side.

"The train is ready to go," I told her; "they've shut us out."

The station was full of people, but Ruth didn't care. She turned to the guard who had shut the gate.

"Let me through," she beseeched him; "it's important that I get this train. I must get it."

But the guard stood firm. "Sorry, lady," he told her, "but it's against the rules."

And then Ruth lost her temper as I had seen her lose it when she hit me with a stone, and when her brother had spilled the chocolate. The flush faded out of her face, leaving it pale and sharp.

"I hate you!" she said to the guard. "I hate you! You might have let me through. I hate you!" Her foot stamped on the ground, and witl ll her might she threw a paper packag cross the station. It struck a cour old gentleman, and, bursting, fell at feet. Pink rose petals littered the floor

We were the center of a g ning crowd. I shrank back against post and watched as the old gentleman cked up the roses and carried them er to Ruth. His face was stern as he nded them to her.

"Young lady," he said, "I don't know who you are or what you a , but I want to tell you one thing. ou've got to control that temper of yo s, for it's hurting no one but yours It didn't hurt me when the package t me. It only disgusted me. But it rea did hurt you. If you keep on lettin go of yourself, you'll land in an sane asylum. I know. And no one ll be sorry to have you go there. For ople with a temper like yours are a nace to any community."

Ruth stood pale and aghast. one had ever talked to her that way And the crowd, ever shifting, driftec way from where she stood. And just the old man was going to speak a in a young man, handsome, broad ouldered, athletic, came up from behi and gripped his shoulder.

"Why, dad," cried the youn man gladly, "how did you happen find Ruth?"

And though I had never met m, I knew that it was Bob.

LATE that night, after the gues had all retired, I went into Ruth's oom. She was lying on her bed, sobbi but she sat up at the sound of my ste

"I will never," she told me dist tly, "lose my temper again. And I v tell Bob everything tomorrow. Perha "—her voice broke—"perhaps he on't want to marry a girl who might d up in an insane asylum. But no tter what happens, I will never lo my temper again."

And she never did. For Ruth ade good—just as other girls make ood with difficult problems. She tc me that it was hard, desperately h l at times. Sometimes she'd have to up to her room and lock her door ar bite her bedpost. Sometimes she wou fall on her knees and ask God for hel But no matter how much she wanted give way—and I've seen her in some ex perating situations—she'd turn her ack and hum a tune before she spoke She told me that while she was hu ning she'd say "insane asylum" and enace" over and over in her mind. And finally she won out, for by controll her temper she found that she had ver occasions to lose it.

I WAS visiting Ruth the other y in her new home. Her father-i aw, who loves her very much, lives vith them. She does her own work and after supper I went out into the k hen and helped her wash the dishes. Bob dried them, and, man-like, he got terested in the conversation as h was drying Ruth's handsomest cut ass, silver-mounted pitcher, and drop it. It was one of her wedding present and I started back in very real fear ore the expected storm. But the stor did not break.

"I'm sorry, dear," said Bob, hu bly. "I'm awfully sorry." But Ruth cu him short.

"Don't you care," she told him soothingly. "We may get another me day, dear."

CHAPTER XXV—Continued

MRS. TANNER had prepared a nice little supper—more cold chicken and pie and doughnuts and coffee, and some of h famous marble cake—and she insi ed on Margaret's coming into the d ng-room and eating it, though the g would much rather have gone with h happy heart up to her own room b herself.

ud did not wait on ceremony. He b an at once when Margaret was sc ed, even before his mother could get h properly waited on.

Well, we had some ride, we sure did! T Kid's a great old scout."

largaret perceived that this was a le er.

Why, that's so, what became of you, W liam? I hunted everywhere for you. T ngs were pretty strenuous there for a hile and I needed you dreadfully."

Well, I know," Bud apologized. "I oughta let you know before I went, b there wasn't time. You see, I had to inch that guy's horse to go, and I k w it was just a chance if we could g back anyway; but I had to take it. Y see, if I could of gone right to the ca n, it would have been a dead cinch, b I had to ride to camp for the men, a then even taking the short trail a oss it was some ride to Ouida's C bin!"

Irs. Tanner stopped aghast as she w cutting a piece of dried apple pie fo Margaret.

Now, Buddie, mother's boy, you d 't mean to tell me you went to O da's Cabin? Why, sonnie, that's an a ul place! Don't you know your pa t you he'd whip you if you ever went o hat trail?"

I should worry, ma! I had to go. T y had Mr. Gardley tied up there, a we had to go and get him rescued."

You had to go, Buddie—now what c d you do in that awful place?" Mrs. T ner was almost reduced to tears. S saw her offspring at the edge of p lition at once.

ut Bud ignored his mother and went o with his tale.

"YOU just oughta seen Jap Kemp's face when I told him what that g said to you! Some face! B'leeve me! H saw right through the whole thing t I could see that! He, ner the men, h n't had a bite o' supper yet, they'd ju got back from somewheres. They th ght the Kid was over here all day h ing you. He said yesterday when he le em, here's where he was a-comin" —ud's mouth was so full he could h lly articulate—"and when I told h , he jest blew his little whistle, like w t they all carried, three times, and th e men every one jest stopped right w re they was whatever they was d n'. Long Bill had the comb in the ai gettin' ready to comb his hair, and h eft it there to wing back into place o ts string and came away! And Big Ji never stopped to wipe his face on t roller towel, he just let the wind dry it and they all sprung on their horses fa as ever they could and rode out a r Jap Kemp. Jap, he rode alongside o ne and asked me questions. He m le me tell all what the guy from the F t said over again, three or four times, a then he ast what time he got to the sc olhouse, and whether the Kid had b n there at all yest'day ur t'day; and a t of other questions, and then he r e alongside each man and told him in ju a few words where we was goin' and w t the guy from the Fort had said. Y 'd oughta heard what the men said w n he told 'em. But they was some m l! By an' by we came to the woods r nd the Cabin, and Jap Kemp made m stick alongside Long Bill, and he sent t men off in different directions all i circle, and waited till each man was i his place, and then we all rode hard a ve could and came softly up round th cabin just as the sun was goin' d n. You'd oughta seen the scairt look on them women's faces; there was two of 'em, an old un and a skinny-looking, younger one. I guess she was a girl, I don't know. Her eyes looked real old. There was only three men in the cabin—the rest was off somewhere—they wasn't looking for anybody to come that time o' day, I guess. One of the men was sick on a bunk in the corner. He had his head tied up and his arm, like he'd been shot, and the other two men came jumping up to the door with their guns, but when they saw how many men we had they looked awful scairt. We all had our guns out too! Jap Kemp gave me one to carry—" Bud tried not to swagger as he told this but it was almost too much for him. "Two of our men held the horses and all the rest of us got down and went into the cabin, Jap Kemp sounding his whistle and all the men doing the same just as they went in the door, some kind of signals they have. The two men in the doorway aimed straight at Jap Kemp and fired, but Jap was onto 'em and jumped one side, and our men fired too, and we soon had 'em tied up and went in—that is, Jap and me and Long Bill went in—the rest stayed by the door, and it wasn't long 'fore their other men came riding back hot haste; they'd heard the shots, you know—and some more of our men, why, most twenty or thirty there was, I guess, altogether, some from Lone Fox Camp that was watching off in the woods came—and when we got outside again there they all were, like a big army, and most of the men belonging to the cabin was tied and harmless by that time, for our men took 'em one at a time as they came riding in. Two of 'em got away, but Jap Kemp said they couldn't go far without being caught, cause there was a watch out for 'em—they'd been stealing cattle long back something terrible. Well, so Jap Kemp and Long Bill and I went into the cabin after the two men was shot and tied with ropes we'd brung along, and handcuffs, and we went hunting for the Kid. At first we couldn't find him at all. It was something fierce! And the old woman kep' a crying and saying we'd kill her sick son, and she didn't know nothing about the man we was hunting for. But pretty soon I spied the Kid's foot stickin' out from under the cot where the sick man was, and when I told Jap Kemp that sick man pulled out a gun he had under the blanket and aimed it right at me!"

"Oh, mother's little Buddie!" whimpered Mrs. Tanner with her apron to her eyes.

"Aw, ma, he didn't hurt me! The gun just went off crooked, and grazed Jap Kemp's hand a little, not much. Jap knocked it out of the sick man's hand just as he was pullin' the trigger. Say, ma, ain't you got any more of those cucumber pickles? It makes a man mighty hungry to do all that riding and shooting. Well, it certainly was something fierce—say, Miss Earle, you take that last piece o' pie. Oh, g'wan! Take it! You worked hard. No, I don't want it really!—well—if you wouldn't take it anyway, I might eat it just to save it. Got any more coffee, ma?"

BUT Margaret was not eating. Her face was pale and her eyes were starry with unshed tears, and she waited in patient but breathless suspense for the vagaries of the story to work out to the finish.

"Yes—it certainly was something fierce, that cabin," went on the narrator. "Why, ma, it looked as if it had never been swept under that cot, when we hauled the Kid out. He was tied all up in knots and great heavy ropes wound tight from his shoulders down to his ankles. Why, they were bound so tight they made great heavy welts in his wrists and shoulders and round his ankles when we took them off, and they had a great big rag stuffed into his mouth so he couldn't yell. It was something fierce! He was most dippy, too; but Jap Kemp brought him round pretty quick and got him outside in the air. That was the worst place I ever was in myself. You couldn't breathe, and the dirt was something fierce. It was like a pig-pen. I sure was glad to get outdoors again. And then—well, the Kid came around all right and they got him on a horse and gave him something out of a bottle Jap Kemp had, and pretty soon he could ride again. Why, you'd oughta seen his nerve. He just sat up there as straight—his lips were all white yet and his eyes looked some queer, but he straightened up and he looked those rascals right in the eye, and told 'em a few things, and he gave orders to the other men from Lone Fox Camp what to do with 'em, and he had the two women disarmed—they had guns too—and carried away, and the Cabin nailed up and a notice put on the door, and every one of those men were handcuffed—the sick one and all—and he told them to bring a wagon and put the sick one's cot in and take 'em over to Ashland to the jail, and he sent word to Mr. Rogers. Then we rode home, and got to the schoolhouse just as you was playing the last chords of the over'cher. It was some fierce ride, and some close shave! The Kid he hadn't had a thing to eat since Monday noon, and he was some hungry! I found a sandwich on the window of the dressing-room and he ate it while he got togged up. Course I told him 'bout Jed soon's we left the Cabin—and Jap Kemp said he oughta go right home to camp after all he had been through, but he wouldn't, he said he was goin' to act. So course he had his way! But you could see it wasn't any cinch game for him! He most fell over every time after the curtain shut. You see they gave him some kind of drugged whisky up there at the Cabin that made his head feel queer."

In the quiet of her chamber at last Margaret knelt before her window toward the purple shadowy mountain under the starry dome, and gave thanks for the deliverance of Gardley; while Bud in his comfortable loft lay down to his well-earned rest and dreamed of pirates and angels, and a hero who looked like "the Kid."

CHAPTER XXVI

THE Sunday before Lance Gardley started East on his journey of reparation, two strangers slipped quietly into the back of the schoolhouse during the singing of the first hymn and sat down in the shadow by the door.

Margaret was playing the piano when they came in and did not see them, and when she turned back to her Scripture lesson she had time for but the briefest of glances. She supposed they must be some visitors from the Fort, perhaps, as they were speaking to the captain's wife, who still came over occasionally to the Sunday service, perhaps because it afforded an opportunity for a ride with one of the young officers. These occasional visitors who came for amusement and curiosity had ceased to trouble Margaret. Her real work was with the men and women and children who loved the service for its own sake, and she tried as much as possible to forget outsiders. So, that day the service went on just as usual, Margaret putting her heart into the prayer, the simple story-like reading of the Scripture, and the other story-sermon which followed it. Gardley sang unusually well at the close, a wonderful bit from an oratorio that he and Margaret had been practicing.

But when, toward the close of the little vesper service, Margaret gave opportunity, as she often did, for others to take part in sentence prayers, one of the strangers from the back of the room stood up and began to pray. And such a prayer! Heaven seemed to bend low, and earth to kneel and beseech as the strange man, with a face like an archangel, and the body of an athlete, clothed in a brown flannel shirt and khakis, besought the Lord of heaven for a blessing on this gathering and on the leader of this little company who had so wonderfully led them to see the Christ and their need of salvation. And it did not need Bud's low-breathed whisper, "The missionary!" to tell Margaret who he was. His face told her. His prayer thrilled her, and his strong, young, true voice made her sure that here was a man of God in truth.

When the prayer was over and Margaret stood once more shyly facing her audience, she could scarcely keep the tremble out of her voice:

"Oh," said she, casting aside ceremony, "if I had known the missionary was here I should not have dared to try and lead this meeting today. Won't you please come up here and talk to us for a little while now, Mr. Brownleigh?"

AT once he came forward, eagerly, as if each opportunity were a pleasure. "Why surely, I want to speak a word to you, just to say how glad I am to see you all and to see what a wonderful teacher you have found since I went away; but I wouldn't have missed this meeting today for all the sermons I ever wrote or preached. You don't need any more sermon than the remarkable story you've just been listening to, and I've only one word to add, and that is, that I've found since I went away that Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, is just the same Jesus to me today that he was the last time I spoke to you. He is just as ready to forgive your sin, to comfort you in sorrow, to help you in temptation, to raise your body in the resurrection, and to take you home to a mansion in his Father's house, as he was the day he hung upon the cross to save your soul from death. I've found I can rest just as securely upon the Bible as the Word of God as when I first tested its promises. Heaven and earth may pass away, but his Word shall never pass away'"

"Go to it!" said Jasper Kemp under his breath in the tone that some men say "Amen!" and his brows were drawn as if he were watching a battle. Margaret couldn't help wondering if he were thinking of the Rev. Frederick West just then.

When the service was over the missionary brought his wife forward to Margaret, and they loved one another at once. Just another sweet girl like Margaret she was, lovely with a delicacy of feature that betokened the high-born and high-bred, but dressed in a dainty khaki riding costume, if that uncompromising fabric could ever be called dainty.

The eight men from the camp stood in solemn row, waiting to be recognized, and behind them, abashed and grinning with embarrassment, stood Pop and Mom Wallis—Mom with her new gray bonnet glorifying her old face—till the missionary's wife had to look twice to be sure who she was.

"And now, surely, Hazel, we must have these dear people come over and help us with the singing sometimes. Can't we try something right now?" said the missionary looking first at his wife and then at Margaret and Gardley. "This man is a newcomer since I went away, but I'm mighty sure he is the right kind, and I'm glad to welcome him—or perhaps I would better ask if he will welcome me?" and with his rare smile the missionary put out his hand to Gardley, who took it with an eager grasp. The two men stood looking at one another for a moment as rare men rarely met sometimes do even on a sinful earth. After that clasp and that look, they turned away, brothers for life.

"I SHALL feel better about leaving you here while I am gone, since they have come," said Gardley that night when he was bidding Margaret good-night. "I couldn't bear to think there were none of your own kind about you. The others are kind and would do for you with their lives if need be as far as they know, but I like you to have real friends. Real Christian friends. This man is what I call a Christian, and a real preacher. That man West that was here when you came was a mistake!"

"He didn't even preach much," smiled Margaret, "so how could he live it? This man is real. And there are others. Oh, I have known a lot of them that are living lives of sacrifice and loving service and are yet just as strong and happy and delightful as if they were millionaires. But they are the men who have not thrown away their Bibles and their Christ. They believe every promise in God's word, and rest on them day by day, testing them and proving them over and over. I wish you knew my father!"

"I am going to," said Gardley proudly. "I am going to him just as soon as I have finished my business and straightened out my affairs; and I am going to tell him everything—with your permission, Margaret!"

"Oh, how beautiful!" cried Margaret with happy tears in her eyes. "To think you are going to see father and mother. I've wanted them to know the real you I couldn't half tell you in a letter!"

"Perhaps they won't look on me with your sweet blindness, dear," he said, smiling tenderly down on her. "Perhaps your father and mother will not feel like giving their daughter to me after they know. Remember, I realize just what a rare prize she is."

"No, father is not like that, Lance," said Margaret with her rare smile lighting up her happy eyes. "Father and mother will understand."

"But if they should not?" There was the shadow of sadness in Gardley's eyes as he asked the question.

"I belong to you, dear, anyway," she said with sweet surrender. "I trust you though the whole world were against you."

For answer Gardley took her in his arms, and, stooping, laid his lips upon hers in tender reverence.

"Margaret! You wonderful Margaret!" he said. "How God has blessed me in sending you to me! With his help I will be worthy of you!"

THREE days more and Margaret was alone with her school work, her two missionary friends—twenty miles away—her eager watching for the mail to come, her faithful attendant, Bud; and for her comfort the purple mountain with its changing glory in the distance.

A few days before Gardley left for the East he had been offered a position by Rogers as general manager of his estate at a fine salary, and after consultation with Margaret he had decided to accept it, but the question of their marriage they had left by common consent unsettled until Gardley should return and be able to offer his future wife a record made as fair and clean as human hand could make it after human mistakes had unmade it. As Margaret worked and waited, wrote her charming letters to father and mother and lover, and thought her happy thoughts with only the mountain for confidante, she did not plan for the future except in a dim and dreamy way. She would make those plans with Gardley when he returned. Probably they must wait some time before they could be married. Gardley would have to earn some money and she must earn, too. She would keep the Ashland school another year at any rate. She was sometimes a trifle disturbed over the summer vacation. She longed with all her heart to see her father and mother, yet it cost a good deal to go back and forth; and then perhaps Gardley would return soon—and she would have to leave him. She was torn between two desires. However, she tried to put these things out of mind, do her work, and just be happy.

IN due time, just before the spring commencement, while all the flutter of getting ready for the closing exercises was upon the school, Gardley returned, bringing with him a flashing diamond, pure as a dewdrop, priceless and rare—one that had belonged to Gardley's grandmother, now reset for Margaret. And bringing with him also letters from Margaret's father and mother, letters full of love and blessings, and well-suppressed sighs and sobs.

What with her school duties and her flutter of joy over Gardley's return, and her tears over her mother's precious letter, Margaret had not time to think.

A happy three weeks passed, and then came a telegram for Gardley. His old uncle had died, and the fortune which he had been brought up to believe was his, and which he had idly tossed away in a moment of recklessness, had been restored to him by his uncle's last will, made since his recent visit home. The fortune was his again—was his at last!

Welding the Nations

IN one of the large auditoriums in New York on April 15, before a most enthusiastic audience, representatives of ten races assembled on the stage. It had been announced that each would carry the flag of his nation, and each did; but two of them bore no flags proudly aloft as did the other eight, for they had no nation. But each repeated in his own tongue the sixteenth verse of the third chapter of John: "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Italy, Sweden, Germany, China, Armenia, Japan, Holland, Russia, these bore flags—for even Armenia may claim a national existence. But there came also a Jew and a Negro without flags. No symbol of nationality was theirs, but they, too, were sons of God, bought by the blood; and they came as did the others, rejoicing in the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free.

And while the forces of greed and hate are doing their best to divide the nations, other forces are silently and untiringly at work welding all peoples into one in heart. It is a pleasure to record this interesting rally held by one of these agencies, the Bible Teachers' Training School of New York; for this institution touches many races in its work of teaching the Bible in the native tongue of the student. The extension of such work is bound to have great effect upon the proficiency of missionaries in foreign fields.

Dr. Wilbert W. White organized this school back in 1900 with very modest facilities, and has seen grow up around him an unusually strong and loyal faculty and student body. The study of the Bible itself in the mother tongue has been the foundation stone of the institution's success. Its students have thus far entered the ministry of nine denominations, and several hundred missionaries have been enrolled in its courses. The school is steadily preparing a large body of young people for trained Christian work, and a very helpful feature of the curriculum is the practical work which each student is required to do in the form of a weekly appointment in the teaching of the Bible to classes in Sunday schools, homes and other places outside of the school itself.

The church at large is to be congratulated on the establishment of Bible study schools so thoroughly organized and well equipped as is this one. But Dr. White, in addressing the audience in Æolian Hall on April 15, deplored the unreadiness of the church or its inability, whichever is the explanation, to take advantage of the work of such institutions. He declared that young women frequently gave up good positions, even those paying from $1,200 to $1,800 a year, in order to consecrate their lives to Christian service, and after two or three years of careful training they found themselves offered positions at half that amount. Willing as they are to sacrifice, Dr. White held that this was asking almost too much.

One way and another, the churches of the land spend in the aggregate a vast sum of money for the paraphernalia of Sunday school and other work, and then complain bitterly at the incompetency of those upon whom the teaching and the leading depend. It might not be at all amiss for individual churches to consider the wisdom of diverting some of this money to the securing of trained lay workers, and to the training of their own young people for leadership. In every congregation there are some who are especially gifted for work in the Sunday school and in the other organizations, who would be veritable towers of strength under proper training for their duties.

After a visit of Dr. White to China in 1910, a school was organized in Nanking patterned after the school in New York. At the present time there are two schools in China and one in Korea operating under the same plan, and the missionaries on the field greatly desire the establishment of such a school in each province of China.

The Mental Effect Of Oat-Food

Doctors say that languidness is often a mental condition. If so, oats deal with that.

All folks know oats as the vim-food. All experience, plus the lore of ages, prove their spirit-giving powers.

One expects to "feel his oats."

And one effect of oats, no doubt, lies in that expectation.

But oats do hold a wealth of energy. Science states it at 75 per cent. They have the same effect on animals as they do on men.

Spring is the time for a 30-day course in oats. You will have a new idea then of their animating powers.

Quaker Oats

The Matchless Oat Dainty

The finest oat food man can make is found in Quaker Oats. These flakes are made from queen oats only—just the big, plump grains. We get but ten pounds from a bushel.

It is these choice grains—the cream of the oats—which have this delightful flavor. It is never mixed in Quaker Oats with any puny grains.

This extra quality costs you no extra price. The grains we discard are used elsewhere. Does it not seem folly not to get it, when this flavor means so much.

"Lo, We Turn to the Gentiles"

International Sunday School Lesson for May 14.
Acts 13: 13-52

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"I have set thee for a light for the Gentiles." Acts 13 : 47.

God has never forgotten the great world of men, even when he seemed to be bending his special love and strength to the lot of the chosen people. The original promise to Abram was that he should be blessed in order that all nations should be blessed in him. All that God did for the chosen people was intended for them to communicate to the world. They were the trustees of God for humanity, and were cast on the rubbish-heap because they abused their trust. It is, therefore, one of the most wonderful things in the Gospel that though our Lord was born a Jew, reared in the heart of a conservative interpretation of the Law, and inspired by an intensely patriotic spirit, he yet attracts to himself all mankind. Birds of every wing build in the great tree of the Gos In Jesus Christ there is neither Jew Greek, barbarian, Scythian, bond free. Born of a Jewish maiden, Je unlike the Hebrew folk, is the Son of m Every man can find what he needs in h Jesus understands every man; can expl every man to himself; can supply complete every man; and is able to s every man, and realize the best in character. No one race, or age, or can claim Jesus Christ. He transce them all, embraces them all, and cro all. Behold a great multitude of ev nation, kindred, people, and tongue acclaim him Lord, and find in him Head and Leader of a new redeen humanity!

Light for the Gentiles

By Arthur H. Howland

THE best way to study this chapter is to study another chapter. In Romans 11 Paul paints a picture of the relative positions of Jews and Gentiles in the great story of God's redemption. He thinks of all the people of the world whom God is going to bless and use and save as a tree. This tree grows out from God as an olive tree grows from its root. Because they refused to obey God, the Jewish people were cut off from the tree of life. The Gentiles were grafted on and became just as real a part of the tree and shared just as richly in the divine life as had the Jews. As we review the history of the centuries that have elapsed since Paul wrote these words it seems that this same thing has happened more than once since. The Reformation was the grafting in of a great new group of souls into the old tree of God, while disobedient branches were cut off again. The same thing happened at the time of the Wesleyan revival in England. The great body of the church people, clergy and laity alike, were formal, cold, dead, fruitless. John Wesley and his fellow workers led multitudes into the divine life, and these were grafted on to God's tree, while thousands of souls fell off, lifeless, useless.

The most important question that could possibly be discussed during the lesson period this Sunday is: "Is my denomination, is my church, is my life vitally joined with God?" The question is not: "Was it formerly joined to him? Was it fruitful in other years?" But, "Is it fruitful now? Is God's grace and power flowing through my life now? Am I bearing fruit for him now?" Jesus said, "Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in me, no more can ye, except ye abide in me. He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit. But without me ye can do nothing. If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch that is withered."

Paul makes a beautiful prophecy in this eleventh chapter of Romans that these discarded branches may yet be grafted back upon God's tree. Partial lifelessness has happened to Israel "until the fulness of the Gentiles come." Then "All Israel shall be saved." "For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance." That is a beautiful picture—God's disobedient children coming back to him again, to be joined to him, to be filled with his light, and to do his work.

NOW let us see what happened to Paul and Barnabas. Their journeyings had taken them as far as Antioch in Pisidia, that other town which we were warned last week not to confuse with the great city of Syria. We noted last week that John Mark went back to Jerusalem, refusing for some unknown reason to go forward with the disciples.

How many of us have ever been in a Jewish synagogue? There are sco s of synagogues here in New York City and in some ways their order of ser e is much like that which prevailed i the provinces of Asia centuries ago. The men, you know, keep their hats in the synagogue. I am told by Mr. A. M. Schapiro, head of the He ew-Christian Literature Society at ew York, who is recognized as an autl ity on matters of Jewish lore, that thi us-tom is in the nature of a protest ag nst the customs of Christians. It an effort to obey the command utter by Moses: "The doings of the la of Egypt, wherein ye dwelt, ye shall n do. And after the doings of the la of Canaan, whither I bring you, ye sha not do, neither shall ye walk in their di-nances." To the ancient and me val Jew the Christian was an idolate the follower of a pagan philosophy. Because the Christians remove thei ats in church, the Jews refuse to do so. The Jews used often to kneel in praye out since that is now the ordinary p ure of the Christian at his devotions, ey stand. The sign of utmost reve nce among the Jews is still, of cours the removal of the shoes. This form observed only twice a year, once o the Day of Atonement, and again on th anniversary of the destruction of th Jerusalem temple. "The rulers o the synagogue" are a group of men wl are the presidents of various societies the congregation. There is, for inst ce, the Society of the Holy Company ho look after the burial of the dead another society for visiting the sick another, for arranging marriages, pa cu-larly, Mr. Schapiro tells me, for ose young women of the congregatio ho are poor or who are not good-looki or who will soon cease to be young. is considered to be a duty of the cong gation to see that these sisters d not remain in the woes of the singl ife. Collectively, the presidents of these ri-ous societies are known as "the ers of the synagogue." Some Ame an synagogues elect a president (or Ga a). This dignitary is not the rabbi o the cantor, but a layman, generally a m of wealth and social standing. He its, frock-coated and silk-hatted, on a exalted seat near the altar, where s nds the sacred cabinet containing the T ah, or Law.

In this synagogue at Pisidian An och on a Sabbath morning long ag he rulers of the synagogue, correspo ing to our deacons, elders, stewards noticed two strangers sitting. Obse ing that they were men of sobriety, rnestness and experience, the rulers ent word to them, perhaps simply is-pering to one another, passing he whispered word along, asking th if they did not have some message f he people. Passages from the Law nd the prophets had already been read om the sacred scroll. This was Paul' op-portunity, and he stood up, his art burning with love for Christ, and ith joy at this opportunity of tellin his own people in this distant city abou he Messiah who had come. It will l an interesting study to compare this er-m of Paul's with the sermon of Peter or e day of Pentecost, and the sermon of ephen in reply to his accusers. Paul re ws briefly the history of God's ch en people up to the time of David. Tl showed him to be a devout student of e Jewish Scriptures and an ardent be ver in them. Notice how skilfully Pa passes from discussing what they be ved in solidly to the thing which he wa ed them to believe. While he is sti praising their hero David, he de- cla s: "Of this man's seed hath God, ac rding to his promise, raised unto Is l a Saviour, Jesus."

e tells of John, the connecting link be een the Old Testament and the N , the last of the prophets, and his an uncement that the Messiah was ab t to come. "Men and brethren," he nounces joyously, "children of the st of Abraham, and whosoever an g ye that feareth God, to you is the w of this salvation sent." He lays th lame for the death of this Messiah up the people of Jerusalem and their ru s.

ere is an expression in this twenty- se th verse which makes a good to for a bit of earnest class dis- cu on: "They knew him not, nor yet th oices of the prophets which are read ev Sabbath day." They had heard th sacred prophecies week by week, ye hen the fulfilment came they did no understand. How many of the pe le in our churches and the pupils in r Bible schools hear and read and st y sacred truth Sunday after Sun- da yet fail to get any real, rich, spirit- ua ctualities in their lives! Last week we iscussed that happy time when the be tiful word "Christian" was first us . Did it make us wonder whether or t we personally had a real right to th high title? Are we Christians, not on in the sense of professing Christ's na , nor even of trying to keep his co nandments, but in that deeper se of knowing and loving and trusting hi of relying upon the grace of God, wh h was revealed in his death and res rection to renew our hearts? It will be sad thing if we go through these be tiful lessons, telling the stories of the ea victories of the church, without get- tin rich spiritual gains in our own souls.

ul, describing further this slain M iah, declared that his enemies fou l no cause of death in him, yet de- sir the governor to order his execution. He was crucified, buried, "but God rai l him from the dead. And he was see many days by those who came up wi him from Galilee to Jerusalem, wh are his witnesses unto the people. An we declare unto you glad tidings, ho that the promise which was made un the fathers, God has fulfilled unto us, eir children, in that he hath raised up esus again." Then he makes the sa quotations from the Psalms which Pe used on the day of Pentecost, qu ing the prophecies that when the M iah should come he should not ex- pe nce the corruption of the grave. Th e prophecies had been fulfilled in the ase of Jesus. And now, "through thi nan, is preached unto you the for- giv ess of sins. And by him all that be ve are justified from all things, from wh h ye could not be justified by the la of Moses." Here Paul announces his gre doctrine of justification by faith, th octrine which he amplifies so pow- erf y in his letters to the Romans and to e Galatians.

is hard not to wish that Paul had clo d his sermon without the threat wh h he used. Up to this point his ser- m had seemed so sweet, so powerful, so answerable that we can not help wo lering if he might not have won m to a sympathy with the new faith if had closed with a loving appeal ra r than with the threat of the curse of obedience.

Y U will notice that the reading of verse 2 is very different in the Re sed Version from the wording of the Au orized. It is not likely that any Ge iles, except those who were pros- ely s, that is, converts to the Jewish fai were present in the synagogue. Th Revised Version reads: "And as the went out" (that is, Paul and Bar- na s) "they" (that is, the members, or mo likely the rulers, of the congrega- tio "besought that these words might be oken to them the next Sabbath."

Then as the congregation broke up, "many of the Jews and other devout proselytes followed Paul and Barnabas." Some, perhaps, went all the way with the missionaries to their temporary lodgings in the city. Those who had manifested their interest in the new message were urged to continue in the grace of God.

The next Sabbath great crowds came to hear the new preachers. How can we possibly account for the strange envy that filled the hearts of the Jews as they saw strangers flocking to the synagogue to hear the glad tidings which were to be announced? The old racial exclusiveness of the Jews here exhibited itself again. It seemed that they could not stand the thought that others could share with them God's favor, God's grace, God's light. Many of them felt doubtless that in this attitude they were simply obeying the ancient commands to keep themselves separated from other peoples. But they were looking back toward the old law rather than forward for new light, so they shut their eyes to the light when it came, and were angry that other people welcomed it with radiant gladness.

Then Paul and Barnabas revolted. They probably felt that they did not have time to argue with unwilling people when all about them were pressing the crowds of outsiders eager to hear the glad word of grace. That was an awful accusation they made to the Jews: "Ye judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life." Jesus said something like that: "I do not judge you," he declared. "You judge yourselves. Your own acts condemn you." And so these Jews in turning away from the new Gospel passed judgment upon themselves and turned back into the dark.

"Lo, we turn to the Gentiles." Peter had preached to the household of Cornelius. Paul had already done some work for the Gentiles, but at this great moment he and his companion took up the mission to the Gentiles for their chief work. Paul's title throughout the centuries of Christianity has been "the apostle to the Gentiles." He caught up out of the ancient Scriptures those glowing passages which told of the bursting forth of God's light among the darkened nations of the world, and bent his chief energies henceforth toward making these prophecies come true. God had promised that the Messiah should be a light to the Gentiles, and Paul devoted himself to the task of holding up that light and pointing the eyes of men toward its splendors.

The Gentiles heard, and believed, and rejoiced. "And the word of the Lord was published throughout all the region."

But the Jews stirred up the devout and honorable women and the chief men of the city, and raised persecution against Paul and Barnabas, and expelled them from the city limits.

In what mood was it that these brave wayfarers went on toward the next town? There was indignation in their hearts that they had been so unfairly treated and that their message had been rejected. There was sorrow for those who had refused to see the light, but there was something deeper and stronger in their hearts than indignation and sorrow. They were "filled with joy and with the Holy Ghost."

Napoleon was deathly afraid of a Razor

THE Emperor Napoleon never permitted anyone near him with an open razor. He did his own shaving and, owing to a sensitive skin, never could get a razor that pleased him. The one that annoyed him least was picked up during the Peninsular Campaign and had a blade of Saracen steel.

Today nearly all the world's Rulers use a Gillette Safety Razor. The latest convert is Yuan Shih k'ai, the great man of China.

Another is the Premier of New Zealand.

In the present war the Gillette is used by the leading generals and by some 3,000,000 men in the trenches and on all fronts.

The Gillette shave is quick and cool, safe and sanitary. It is velvet-smooth, no matter how wiry the beard or tender the skin. Adjust the handle for a light or a close shave. A keen, fresh blade is always ready. No stropping—no honing. Prices $5 to $50. Blades 50c. to $1 the packet. Dealers everywhere.

EXPERIMENTS

Teach Things of Value.

Where one has never made the experiment of leaving off coffee and drinking Postum, it is still easy to learn something about it by reading the experiences of others.

Drinking Postum is a pleasant way out of coffee troubles. A Penn. man says:

"My wife was a victim of nervousness, weak stomach and loss of appetite for years; and although we resorted to numerous methods for relief, one of which was a change from coffee to tea, it was all to no purpose.

"We knew coffee was causing the trouble but could not find anything to take its place until we tried Postum. Within two weeks after she quit coffee and began using Postum almost all of her troubles had disappeared as if by magic. It was truly wonderful. Her nervousness was gone, stomach trouble relieved, appetite improved and, above all, a night's rest was complete and refreshing.

"This sounds like an exaggeration, as it all happened so quickly. Each day there was improvement, for the Postum was undoubtedly strengthening her. Every particle of this good work is due to drinking Postum in place of coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum comes in two forms:

Postum Cereal—the original form—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c pkgs.

Instant Postum—a soluble powder—dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

Both forms are equally delicious and cost about the same per cup.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

not justified, those assurances insusceptible of being fulfilled. In pursuance of the policy of submarine warfare against the commerce of its adversaries, thus announced and entered upon by the Imperial German Government, despite the solemn protest of this Government, the commanders of German undersea vessels have attacked merchant ships with greater and greater activity, not only upon the high seas surrounding Great Britain and Ireland but wherever they could encounter them, in a way that has grown more and more ruthless, more and more indiscriminate as the months have gone by, less and less observant of restraints of any kind, and have delivered their attacks without compunction against vessels of every nationality and bound upon every sort of errand. Vessels of neutral ownership, even vessels of neutral ownership bound from neutral port to neutral port, have been destroyed along with vessels of belligerent ownership in constantly increasing numbers. Sometimes the merchantman attacked has been warned and summoned to surrender before being fired on or torpedoed; sometimes passengers or crews have been vouchsafed the poor security of being allowed to take to the ship's boats before she was sent to the bottom. But again and again no warning has been given, no escape even to the ship's boats allowed to those on board.

What this Government foresaw must happen has happened. Tragedy has followed tragedy on the seas in such fashion, with such attendant circumstances, as to make it grossly evident that warfare of such a sort, if warfare it be, cannot be carried on without the most palpable violation of the dictates alike of right and of humanity. Whatever the disposition and intention of the Imperial German Government, it has manifestly proved impossible for it to keep such methods of attack upon the commerce of its enemies within the bounds set by either the reason or the heart of mankind.

In February of the present year the Imperial German Government informed this Government and the other neutral Governments of the world that it had reason to believe that the Government of Great Britain had armed all merchant vessels of British ownership and had given them secret orders to attack any submarine of the enemy they might encounter upon the seas, and that the Imperial German Government felt justified in the circumstances in treating all armed merchantmen of belligerent ownership as auxiliary vessels of war, which it would have the right to destroy without warning.

[Excerpt from the Note: Thus, at least by implication, pledging itself to give warning to vessels which were not armed and to accord security of life to their passengers and crews, but even this limitation their submarine commanders have recklessly ignored.]

The law of nations has long ecognized the right of merchantmen t arry arms for protection and to use t m to repel attack, though to use them such circumstances at their own risk but the Imperial German Gove nent claimed the right to set these iderstandings aside in circumstances hich it deemed extraordinary. Ev the terms in which it announced its p pose thus still further to relax the res aints it had previously professed its lingness and desire to put upon the erations of its submarines carried th lain implication that at least vessels hich were not armed would still be mpt from destruction without warni and that personal safety would be ac rded their passengers and crews; bu even that limitation, if it was ever pr ticable to observe it, has in fact cons uted no check at all upon the destruc n of ships of every sort.

Again and again the Imperial G man Government has given this G ernment its solemn assurances tl at least passenger ships would r be thus dealt with, and yet it has gain and again permitted its undersea ommanders to disregard those assu nces with entire immunity. Great ners like the Lusitania and the Arabi and mere ferryboats like the Sussex ave been attacked without a mo nt's warning, sometimes before the had even become aware that they were in the presence of an armed ve l of the enemy, and the lives of none batants, passengers and crew have een sacrificed wholesale in a manner hich the Government of the United ates cannot but regard as wanton and ithout the slightest color of justifi ion. No limit of any kind has, in fact een set to the indiscriminate pursu and destruction of merchantmen all kinds and nationalities within tl waters, constantly extending in rea, where these operations have been ried on; and the roll of Americans wh ave lost their lives on ships thus at ked and destroyed has grown mon by month, until the ominous to has mounted into the hundreds.

One of the latest and most sh king instances of this method of warfa was that of the destruction of the l nch cross-channel steamer Sussex. I ust stand forth, as the sinking of the st mer Lusitania did, as so singularly t ical and unjustifiable as to constitute ruly terrible example of the inhumar of submarine warfare as the comm ders of German vessels have for th past twelve months been conducting If this instance stood alone, some ex anation, some disavowal by the G nan Government, some evidence of cr inal mistake or willful disobedience the part of the commander of the ssel that fired the torpedo might be ght or entertained, but unhappily i does not stand alone.

[Excerpt from the Note: But, ugh the attack upon the Sussex was anifestly indefensible and caused a s of life so tragical as to make it stan orth

On the night of the third day of the fourth week I was awakened about midnight by yells and shouts. I listened and heard the galloping of horses. I felt instantly that the fugitives had been captured. The following morning my two Spanish friends related to me the happenings of the hunt.

"One of those mozos [young men] is in the lockup, dying. The other died in a swamp, buried up to his armpits, fighting for his life and liberty. The one captured had no arms, but the one killed had a pistol, procured somehow, in some way. He fought in the dark, and retreated into the swamp. When morning came he was still alive, but unable to extricate himself from the mud that held him fast. His ammunition being exhausted, he was at the mercy of his captors. Rigging up a kind of a raft, they put out after their man, who fought their every effort to take him out alive. For all the tramping and fighting he had done, he fought them for hours, and through sheer desperation one of those brutes drew his cutlass, and murdered him."

I arose to go. I had heard enough of these two wretched men, who had been so doggedly trailed for weeks, in and out of caves, hc , old trunks of trees, through all kinds of diffi ties, to their death. Liberty has always de ded a high price, and no exception was n e in this case.

is c of the most terrible examples of the nhanity of submarine warfare as the om anders of German vessels are conducting it unhappily does not stand alone. O the contrary, the Government of the Jnd States is forced by recent events o clude that it is only one instance, ven hough one of the most extreme and nos listressing instances, of the deliber- te ethod and spirit of indiscriminate est ction of merchant vessels of all ort nationalities, and destinations which ow ecome more and more unmistakable s t activity of German undersea ves- els f war has in recent months been vic ned and extended.]

R ent events make the conclusion nev able that it is only one instance, ven hough it be one of the most ex- ren and distressing instances, of the pir and method of warfare which the mp ial German Government has mis- ake y adopted and which from the rst xposed that Government to the api ch of thrusting all neutral rights sid n pursuit of its immediate objects.

[I erpt from the Note: Information ow the possession of the Government f t United States fully establishes the icts n the case of the Sussex, and the nfe ces which my Government has rni from that information it regards s firmed by the circumstances set rtl n Your Excellency's note of the 9th nstant. On the 24th of March, 911 at about 2:50 o'clock in the after- oo the unarmed steamer Sussex, with 25 more passengers on board, among ho were a number of American citizens, as rpedoed while crossing from Folke- on o Dieppe. The Sussex had never eu rmed; was a vessel known to be bi ally used only for the conveyance p sengers across the English Channel; ad as not following the route taken by oo ips or supply ships. About eighty h passengers, noncombatants of all jes nd sexes, including citizens of the ni States, were killed or injured.

A areful, detailed and scrupulously np ial investigation by naval and mil- ar ffcers of the United States has con- us ly established the fact that the Sussex as rpedoed without warning or sum- on to surrender, and that the torpedo ich she was struck was of German an acture. In the view of the Gov- an t of the United States these facts on he first made the conclusion that e pedo was fired by a German sub- ar unavoidable. It now considers at nclusion substantiated by the state- en of your Excellency's note. A full ate ent of the facts upon which the ove ment of the United States has based s c clusion is inclosed.

T Government of the United States, te aving given careful consideration th note of the Imperial Government of e h of April, regrets to state that the np sion made upon it by the state- en and proposals contained in that ote that the Imperial Government has ile to appreciate the gravity of the sit- ati which has resulted, not alone from e ack on the Sussex, but from the ho method and character of submarine arf e as disclosed by the unrestrained rac e of the commanders of German nd ea craft during the past twelve- on and more in the indiscriminate st tion of merchant vessels of all sorts, ati alities, and destinations.]

T Government of the United States as en very patient. At every stage th distressing experience of tragedy te ragedy in which its own citizens er nvolved it has sought to be re- ra ed from any extreme course of eti or of protest by a thoughtful on eration of the extraordinary cir- ım ances of this unprecedented war; nd ctuated in all that it said or did y t sentiments of genuine friendship hi the people of the United States av always entertained and continue e ertain toward the German nation. h of course accepted the successive xpl ations and assurances of the np ial German Government as given e ire sincerity and good faith and as oped, even against hope, that it ou prove to be possible for the Ger- ian overnment so to order and control ie ts of its naval commanders as to qu its policy with the principles of un ity as embodied in the law of nations. It has been willing to wait until the significance of the facts became absolutely unmistakable and susceptible of but one interpretation.

That point has now unhappily been reached. The facts are susceptible of but one interpretation. The Imperial German Government has been unable to put any limits or restraints upon its warfare against either freight or passenger ships. It has therefore become painfully evident that the position which this Government took at the very outset is inevitable, namely, that the use of submarines for the destruction of an enemy's commerce is of necessity, because of the very character of the vessel employed and the very methods of attack which their employment of course involves, incompatible with the principles of humanity, the long-established and incontrovertible rights of neutrals, and the sacred immunities of noncombatants.

I have deemed it my duty, therefore, to say to the Imperial German Government that if it is still its purpose to prosecute relentless and indiscriminate warfare against vessels of commerce by the use of submarines, notwithstanding the now demonstrated impossibility of conducting that warfare in accordance with what the Government of the United States must consider the sacred and indisputable rules of international law and the universally recognized dictates of humanity, the Government of the United States is at last forced to the conclusion that there is but one course it can pursue, and that unless the Imperial German Government should now immediately declare and effect an abandonment of its present methods of warfare against passenger and freight carrying vessels, this Government can have no choice but to sever diplomatic relations with the Government of the German Empire altogether.

[See final excerpts from the Note, below, for exact language used to Germany.]

This decision I have arrived at with the keenest regret; the possibility of the action contemplated I am sure all thoughtful Americans will look forward to with unaffected reluctance. But we cannot forget that we are in some sort and by the force of circumstances the responsible spokesmen of the rights of humanity, and that we cannot remain silent while those rights seem in process of being swept utterly away in the maelstrom of this terrible war. We owe it to a due regard for our own rights as a nation, to our sense of duty as a representative of the rights of neutrals the world over, and to a just conception of the rights of mankind to take this stand now with the utmost solemnity and firmness.

I have taken it, and taken it in the confidence that it will meet with your approval and support. All sober-minded men must unite in hoping that the Imperial German Government, which has in other circumstances stood as the champion of all that we are now contending for in the interest of humanity, may recognize the justice of our demands and meet them in the spirit in which they are made.

End of Address.

[Final paragraph of the Note: If it is still the purpose of the Imperial Government to prosecute relentless and indiscriminate warfare against vessels of commerce by the use of submarines, without regard to what the Government of the United States must consider the sacred and indisputable rules of international law and the universally recognized dictates of humanity, the Government of the United States is at last forced to the conclusion that there is but one course it can pursue. Unless the Imperial Government should now immediately declare and effect an abandonment of its present methods of submarine warfare against passenger and freight-carrying vessels, the Government of the United States can have no choice but to sever diplomatic relations with the German Empire altogether. This action the Government of the United States contemplates with the greatest reluctance, but feels constrained to take in behalf of humanity and the rights of neutral nations.

Klaxons say "Supper Time" on big ranch in Peru

THE sound of Klaxon automobile horns is music to the ears of ranch hands in Peru. It means time to stop work and come in for supper.

The big ranches there stretch out for miles. A way was needed to summon the hands. A steam whistle was impractical—it was a difficult problem—until one day one of the ranchers heard a Klaxon on an automobile in Lima.

He bought several and put them on posts a mile apart—all over his ranch. Now it is a simple question of pressing a button. The men in the fields hear the Klaxons. In they come.

600,000 automobilists depend on this same Klaxon carrying power to herald their approach around the turns of country roads and in the noisy traffic of city streets.

The Klaxon is so universally used among motorists that the word "Klaxon" has come to mean "auto horn"—and many horns which are not Klaxons are sold as Klaxons to unsuspecting motorists. To be sure, look for—and find—the Klaxon name-plate.

There is a Klaxon for every kind and size of automobile—for trucks, motor-cycles, motor-boats—from the Hand Klaxonet at $4 to the large Klaxon at $20. Klaxons are made only by the Lovell-McConnell Mfg. Co. of Newark, N. J.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League. All correspondents are specially requested to make their letters as brief as possible. Write requests and acknowledgments on separate sheets.

A PENNSYLVANIA friend, whose brother had lost his mind and also the use of his limbs, wrote recently asking special prayer that he might overcome the liquor habit, to which he had long been addicted. She now writes: "I am thankful to tell you his mind seems clear and he has regained the use of his limbs, and I think he will be a good man. God has certainly answered your prayers. I still ask you to keep on praying for him that he may grow real strong and never go astray again, and that I may regain my hearing. Never cease praying for him."

This letter comes from B. H., Kingman, Ariz.: "After four years of illness I have been enabled through Christ's grace to touch the hem of his garment and be made every whit whole."

Mrs. C. M. K. writes from a town in Illinois: "I wish to tell you that the Lord has heard your prayers and mine in curing my son of the drink habit. For fourteen years he had been a slave to drink, but for a year and a half he has not been drinking, and I know it was through our prayers that he has been able to overcome. I thank and praise God."

A telegram comes from Mrs. S. J. N., Glasco, Kan.: "I am coming to you with another request for prayer for my nephew in Provo, Utah, who had a very bad stroke of paralysis two weeks ago. The doctor says he can not get well, and that he is in the last stages of Bright's disease. Will the League pray that he may be restored to health?"

A friend writes from Salado, Texas: "I ask you to pray earnestly for my nephew, a child six years old, who, when about two years of age, in some unaccountable way lost his speech. It is a peculiar case. He hears all sounds, even the ticking of a clock, the bird singing, all sounds of the different animals, cats, dogs, but does not understand words. He is very intelligent and quick to catch signs. Will you please pray that the right thing—the best thing for the child, the Lord's way—may be opened, and that his mother may be guided. Please pray for this helpless child. He tries to talk, but is bound. Pray that his tongue may be loosened to speak for Jesus."

A reader of Mercer, Pa., writes that the churches and schools of Mercer are closed on account of an epidemic of diphtheria, and requests the Prayer League to pray earnestly that the disease may soon be stamped out with t further sacrifice of life.

Acknowledgments of answere rayer have also been received from:

Among the Workers

A Chinese Archdeacon

THE new China is to be an educated China, and no small part of this education will devolve upon the mission schools. The Protestant Episcopal Church began its educational work in China in 1834. In 1912 its Chinese work was incorporated, with that of the Church of England and the Church of England in Canada, as the "Holy Catholic Church in China," and now embraces eleven dioceses. The Chinese Christians are taking an ever increasing share of the responsibility of the work, one Chinese being an archdeacon of a diocese, with American and English missionaries serving under him. St. John's University at Shanghai, the best known of the Episcopal schools in China, is doing a notable work in training Chinese young men as citizens and for leadership. The standards for admission to St. John's are now practically uniform with those of the best American colleges.

MR. AND MRS. BUTTS, evangelists, held union evangelistic meetings with the churches of Wellsville, N. Y., during March. Mrs. Butts told of one man who had attended an open-air meeting in Union Square, New York. He had said, "I believe the Bible is true," and had turned and walked away. Mr. Butts sent a worker after him, and he invited the minister to come to his el to pray with him at nine o'clock that ning. This man had left home in Connectic forty years before, and he knew that at nine clock every evening his mother was pray for him. The evangelist was prompt, d at nine o'clock he and the man whose other prayed were on their knees in the hot oom. The man rose to praise his Saviour, d returned to his old home to found a C stian home for boys.

EVANGELIST W. E. BIEDERWO and party of ten assistants began a fiv eeks series of revival meetings at Plainfield . J., April 9, in a tabernacle built especially r the campaign.

THE Seventeenth National Conver n of the Gideons will meet at Hunt ton, W. Va., July 20-23, 1916.

My best thanks to the Christian He l for the kindness and trouble in replying my request. I have always found the C stian Herald courteous and painstaking. deserves all the success it has won.

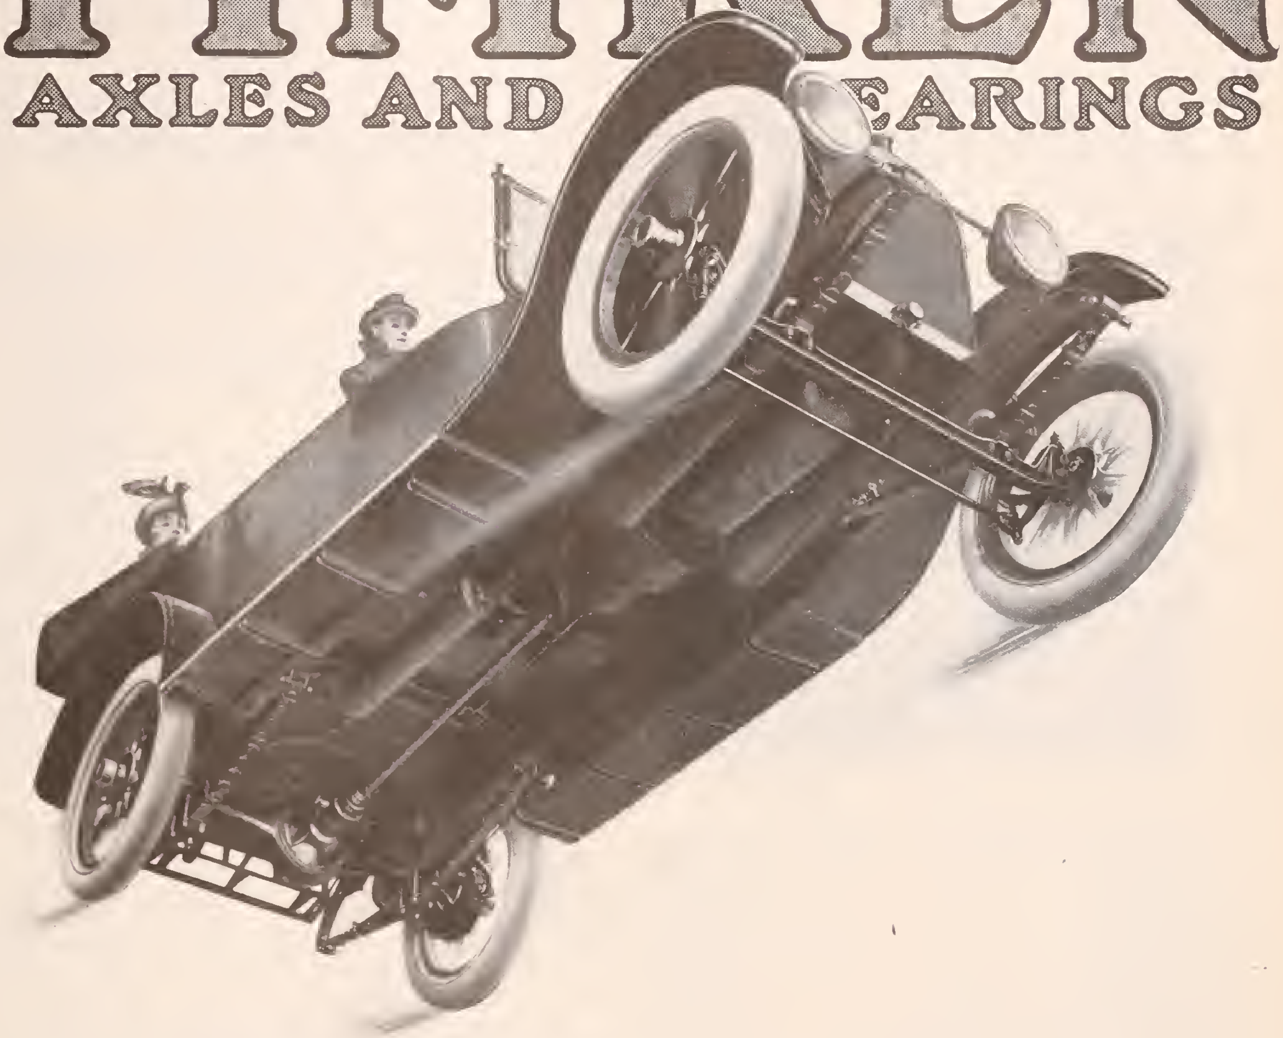
TIMKEN
AXLES AND BEARINGS



As the Road Sees It

FORGET your familiar point of view in the driver's seat and think of your car as it would look from the road. The road knows nothing of the superstructure and its human freight.

It sees a motor car only as a machine—of whirling shafts, throbbing engine, vibrating springs and revolving wheels.

Nearest to it are the axles—dusty and mud-spattered, jarred up and down incessantly as first one wheel and then another strikes a bump or a hole.

If you are to ride in comfort and safety above, the axles must be built for the road below.

Think of that ton or more of dead weight pounding down and from side to side on the bearings and axle spindles.

Think of the strain on hubs and knuckles as your car struggles out of a deep rut or heavy sand.

Think of the sudden demand you make on the gears in your rear axle as you press the accelerator.

Get the road's point of view and you'll realize the importance of forging Timken steering knuckles of one solid piece of steel without a sharp curve or shoulder to invite a break.

You'll understand why Timken patiently grinds the little steering ball to a perfect sphere so there can be no looseness at any point to start the wear that leads to weakness.

You'll get the motive back of years spent by Timken engineers in perfecting a pressed-steel rear axle housing that is light yet tremendously strong.

You'll understand the bigness of the engineering and manufacturing problems solved by Timken in order to give you brakes that will never fail to stop your car—not only when it's new, but after years of hard service.

And you'll appreciate the advantage to you of gears that are designed, ground, and installed to mathematical accuracy by axle specialists.

Timken gears work noiselessly in perfect mesh while the rear axle is being constantly pounded and buffeted by car above, and road beneath.

These are but a few of hundreds of points in good axle building. To really see your motor car as the road sees it, ask for the Timken Primer "On Axles," No. D-9. Sent free, post paid, with a copy of a book telling what cars have Timken Axles and Bearings.

IN an ancient Samaritan synagogue at Shechem this double roll of parchment is guarded jealously and is as zealously preserved. It was to Shechem that Abraham came in his first visit to Canaan. Near Shechem Jacob sank his famous well, and the returning Israelites heard here for the last time the voice of Joshua. Shechem was the first residence of the kings of Israel and was a city of refuge. Here, at Jacob's well, Jesus met the woman of Samaria. Here the great Justin Martyr was born. After the division of Israel into two kingdoms, Shechem became the religious center of the Northern Kingdom, and Jeroboam's self-appointed faith degenerated into the Samaritan worship of our Lord's day, which is perpetuated in the old synagogue which holds this scroll. This double roll of parchment, possibly the oldest in the world, contains the first five books of the Old Testament and may be as old as the days of Jeremiah, who said: "This word came unto Jeremiah from the Lord, saying, Take thee a roll of a book, and write therein." (Jer. 36 : 2.)

"Little Dora" is Dead

MISSIONARY JOHN PERKINS of Garraway Cape Palmas, Liberia, writes: "On August 10 I left Gropaka, Barobo, on the 'Black Diamond Express' This was a special train, consisting of three strong black boys for the hammock-bearers, and a lad to tote my grip. We got up steam at 7 A.M. on hard-tack biscuits and took on water at almost every stream we crossed. At the end of our journey we cooled off. It cost me fourteen cents a mile, and took six hours to run the twelve miles.

"We reached the mission station in Dorobo, the territory of the cannibal tribe, at 1 P.M., and found the missionaries not too well, but happy in their work. The grave of Miss Mariah Tee, who laid down her life for this tribe, is still to be seen, under a beautiful palm tree, a fitting type of her victorious life and death. The mission station is on a high hill, in the midst of the tribe. These people, who used to eat their enemies, are being civilized and Christianized

"The readers of the Christian Herald will be interested to know that 'Little Dora,' whom they helped to redeem from slavery, has passed on to be with Jesus. We were sorry to lose her, but glad that she is now forever free from her heathen surroundings. She knew she was going to die, and had a very remarkable and triumphant death. During the last night of Dora's sickness, Miss Arnold, one of the missionaries, went to her and found her singing 'What a Wonderful Saviour is Jesus, My Jesus!' 'My heart is so happy!' she said shortly before her death. God has surely heard and answered the many prayers that have ascended for 'Little Dora.'"

Questions and Answers

READER, Montezuma, Ind. A man united with the church on probation, seeking and hoping for pardon and the witness of the Spirit, as promised in Rom. 8 : 16. He did not experience any change, but hoped for it after baptism. He was baptized and taken into full membership, but was never conscious of any change. Because he had yielded to temptation he feared to partake of the communion, and later left the church. For many years he lived an ungodly life, and became a very great sinner. Recently he has become convinced of his error and has repented. He is earnestly seeking pardon, but still fails to find the blessing promised in Rom. 8 : 16. The reading of Heb 10 : 23-30, especially verse 26, fills him with fear and sometimes almost causes him to give up hope. A proper interpretation of this passage will be greatly appreciated.

Suppose we start with another passage: "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out" (John 6 : 37); and this: "Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved" (Acts 2 : 21); and this: "Whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins" (Acts 10 : 43); and the beautiful "Whosoever verse" in Revelation. "Let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely" (Rev. 22 : 17). The terrible passage in Hebrews has no reference to the man who is grieving for his sins and really wants to be saved. There are two explanations of that passage: one, that refers to a man who keeps on sinning. The verb "sin wilfully" is in the present tense, which in Greek signifies continued action. If we go on sinning wilfully there is no salvation, but if any man will stop sinning and begin to repent he will be forgiven and saved. The other explanation is that there is no hope for the man who, after receiving Christ, rejects him and tries to get saved some other way. But there is always hope for any man, no matter if he has rejected Christ after first receiving him, who will come back to him in repentance and full surrender. "For every one that asketh receiveth, and he that seeketh findeth, and to him that knocketh, it shall be opened." So far as the witness of the Spirit is concerned, remember that that comes after believing, not before. No one can receive the witness who is doubting God's love and God's welcome. As the soul trusts God to forgive there comes the assurance that he has forgiven.

Anxious, Camden, N. J. If you should return to your former occupation, you would find the field filled with competitors, mostly young women. Of course, very high efficiency would command special recognition.

Christian Herald Reader, Kentucky. Are prayers for gifts actually needed ever denied? I have asked in my daily prayers for the meeting of a great need. If this prayer was answered I could do more for the Master, and it would make life easier. My prayers have been answered in other matters, but this answer has been denied.

Nothing is actually necessary for work for God except a complete willingness to obey him and an unwavering faith. When God called Moses to his great work and asked him, "What is that in thine hand?" he replied, "A staff." That was all he had; but he had faith in God, and God used him and his staff to deliver his people. Paul describes in the first chapter of I Corinthians how "God hath chosen the foolish things of the world, and things which are despised, and things which are not, to bring to naught the things that are." The eleventh chapter of Hebrews shows how the poor and despised of earth have been used of God to do his mighty works. You must not doubt for a moment that "God shall supply all your need according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus." The one fatal mistake is to doubt God's kindness and faithfulness. Get as close to him as you can; take his grace and power into your life; begin with your present opportunities and gifts to work for him, and he will give you more as you are able to use them. So long as your desires are unselfish and your faith firm you will receive ever increasing equipment for your work.

M. E. H., Hantoon, Canada. Matt. 7 : 6 is a warning against the prostitution of holy things. Says one commentator on this verse: "Religion is brought into contempt and professors insulted when it is forced upon those who cannot value it and will not have it." The cynic, the scoffer, the blasphemer, the skeptic, should be dealt with by the experienced, who have learned the value of tact and how to seize a fitting opportunity. But we should be careful not to apply these words in situations where they do not fit, and we should not fall into the error of setting down our neighbors as equally deserving of censure with the scribes and Pharisees. There is a wide difference between plain ignorance of the Gospel and the wilful mockery of it by those who could not plead ignorance as an excuse.

Ethel A. R., Port Huron, Mich. We think your suggestion is correct, although the article was printed as the author wrote it. "Commend" would seem the suitable word under the circumstances.

Mrs. B. M., Middletown, Me. If God has not lost any of his power to heal the sick since Jesus' time, why is healing not preached and taught as Christ commanded?

There is really no answer to your question, for this is precisely what the church ought to do. As the Christian Herald has stated many times, to believe in faith healing does not mean that those who are sick should not seek the best medical and surgical skill. We believe God guides the work and research of the scientists, physicians and surgeons who are constantly extending their knowledge and increasing their skill. When we pray we must use all known available means to bring about the answer to our own prayers. But prayer and faith are incalculable aids to health; they make a channel for God's power to reach and fill the human mind and body, bringing his gift of health. The church should undoubtedly develop and extend this work of healing, teaching its ministers how to strengthen and guide the faith of those who are sick and leading them to the healing Christ. Interest in this phase of Christian work is increasing. Such movements as the Christian Herald Prayer League show how ready the people are to be helped to stronger and more practical faith. Other organizations also are developing the same sort of work and finding their prayer and faith and work honored by the faithful Creator who loves to bless and heal.

Mrs. E. S. S., Cordele, Ga. Why wander in strange fields, when you have the Master's vineyard at your doors? There are some who are allured by every new doctrine. Keep to that which you have tested and know to be true. Stick to your own denomination.

Reader, Oregon. Yours is indeed a hard problem. One who has suffered as you have done, however much he may be disposed to forgive, cannot forget. Still, it is our duty, if we are sincere in our profession as followers of Jesus Christ, to forgive our enemies. Vengeance belongs to the Lord, not to us. To forgive some wrongs would be a task almost beyond human power; yet we can pray for the strength and will to forgive, although to efface them from our memory may be an impossibility. By the mere exercise of our will we cannot compel ourselves to forget; but we may train ourselves to feel no hostility and no desire for revenge. Pray that the Christlike spirit of forgiveness may come into your heart and that repentance may come to the one who has offended you, if it has not already done so. Do not brood over your trouble, or discuss it with others, but leave it all in God's hands, devoting yourself to your daily duties. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" (Gen. 18 : 25.)

Reader, Xenia, Ohio. There have been many well attested incidents of rapturous visions which would seem to prove that many of the redeemed, as death approaches, are given a foreglimpse of "the other side." As some believe, the veil that divides the spirit world from the material becomes well nigh transparent to some who are about to pass away, and who have let go forever of earthly things. The whole question constitutes one of those beautiful mysteries which baffle human solution or explanation.

G. A. S., Fort Collins, Col. The story of the vision of angels at Mons has been thoroughly discredited. Its author has published an admission that it was pure romance on his part, and his statement has been published widely, both in the British and American press. The Christian Herald has referred to it several times.

Reader, Westfield, N. J. Your project of devising some plan to raise money to pay for the flowers used in the pulpit each Sunday should not be difficult of realization. There are several ways in which it might be accomplished. Your idea of a weekly entertainment is a good one, but it might not be practicable at certain seasons of the year. You might have a flower committee (of young ladies preferably), whose duty it would be to arrange for the money. You might get enough individual members pledged to supply each on his own chosen Sunday for the whole year. Or you might do as some city churches do—place some reliable young person in charge of the flower arrangements. It would be his or her duty to visit the homes of members and ask whether they would not like to supply the pulpit flowers in memory of some one who has passed away, or as a birthday or anniversary offering. The flowers would be bought by the person in charge of the arrangements, the family paying what they feel they can allow for that purpose. In this way you ought to have flowers supplied in memory of some former church member almost every Sunday in the year.

Reader, Lakeside Ohio. Write to the American Bible Society, New York, for Gospels in the languages you mention.

J. W., Baldwin, Iowa. 1. The Christian Church to be faithful, must teach the doctrines taught by Jesus Christ while on earth. "Christ and him crucified," was the language of Paul. There may be differences on other matters, but as long as the essentials of the Christian faith are duly preached, there is no ground for apprehension. We do not recognize any of the so-called "religions" which you mention as being entitled to recognition in orthodox Christian churches, and we do not believe that, if the question were raised, they would be so regarded. 2. The phrase in Acts 7 : 53, "the disposition of angels," has given rise to some discussion. It is made clear, however, in the Revised Version, which gives a more correct translation: "as it was ordained by angels." This has been interpreted as suggesting that the ministration of angels was employed at the sublime scene of the giving of the law at Mount Sinai, and there is an implied reference to this in Ps. 68 : 17. 3. The record in John 11 : 16 would seem to imply that Thomas, with several other disciples, if not the whole band, went with Jesus on the occasion of the raising of Lazarus from the dead.

Mary F. Watkins, Center Moriches, N. Y., sends this note to the Mail-Bag: "I am personally acquainted with Mrs. Ingersoll and her daughter, Mrs Brown; besides which I have a circle of friends who have known the Ingersoll family intimately for years. There is absolutely no truth in the story that Colonel Ingersoll professed Christianity in his last hours. He died as he lived, an agnostic."

M. E. H., San Francisco. The leading daily papers in Washington, D. C., are the Star, Herald, Post and Times.

M. M. Y., Lancaster, Ohio. To answer your question would require more space than is available in the Mail-Bag. The authorship of each book of the Bible, the conditions under which the books were written, and how the writers came to be inspired to write as they did, constitute altogether a very large subject.

Mrs. C. J. O., Meridian, Idaho. When Paul wrote in I Corinthians that he was willing to be made all things to all men, if by any means he might save some, he obviously meant that he could come down to the level of those to whose hearts and consciences he appealed, and in a sense could put himself in their place. To the scholar he was scholarly; to the simple he was simple; to the Jew he was tolerant rather than severe and condemnatory. He meant that his ministry was one of kindness and conciliation—an excellent attitude for any minister of the Gospel to take who is endeavoring to win souls to Christ.

J. M. A., Coffeeville, Miss. The passage in Luke 22 : 36 was a forewarning of the hostility which the Gospel and its proclaimers were to encounter in the world. Jesus spoke figuratively, as he did on many other occasions, and the disciples made the mistake of interpreting his words literally, supposing he alluded to immediate measures of defense; therefore he simply closed the conversation, doubtless preferring that his real meaning should sink into their minds when they pondered the matter among themselves. His subsequent utterances, as recorded in Matt. 26 : 52, 53, 54, and corroborated in John's Gospel, confirm this view. In healing the wound inflicted on Malchus, the high priest's servant, Jesus saved Peter's life, for the headstrong disciple would probably have been cut down and his rash act might have cost the lives of the other disciples also. The attitude and language of the Saviour at that critical moment showed beyond question his inflexible opposition to the use of carnal weapons. Yet, in plain violation of his obvious meaning on this occasion, we find even today some who distort the Scriptures into presenting Jesus as an advocate of the sword.

T. G., Houstonville, Calif. It is folly and presumption for any one to attempt to fix the dates for the fulfilment of Scripture prophecy. All who have tried to do so have failed. Jesus himself warned his followers that no man could know the day or the hour, not even the angels.

The Lure of Mount Hermon

By
BYRON P. SMITH

WE mobilized our forces in the ancient city of Sidon. George was the commander-in-chief; the donkey was, perhaps, next in importance. Then Mustafa, official tail-t ster to the donkey and sometimes guide, philos-o er and friend to George and myself.

you look at the map at the back of any teacher's Ble you will find that Mount Hermon is just a short d ance across a few topographical details from Sidon a the Syrian coast, but we chose to go by a round-a ut way into Palestine, w Safed, the Galilean ci set on a hill, as our first o ective.

was to be a walking tr for all four of us. G rge and I wore khaki a were equipped with st helmets against the fi e summer heat. Mus-ta was togged out in p ect imitation of the c mon or garden variety o Syrian peasant, which p he carried off very w , being born to it. The d key (not one of the little m se-colored ones you ride o but a large white one of a rong Damascus breed), in ddition to his padded sa lle and string halter w the inevitable blue b ds to ward off the evil e was decorated with our su lry goods and chattels. T y consisted of two fold-in canvas beds, a pair of sa llebags for our clothing a toilet articles, and an oi box (the original en-ve pe of two five-gallon ti of oil). This box was o kitchen and pantry, and c ained, in addition to a s ll vaporizing oil stove a several bottles of kerose , the bread, olives, ca ed meat and spaghetti su cient for our wandering in e wilderness.

hen we had our per-so l equipment in addi-ti I would have started o n the trip with nothing o my mind but my hat, but George insisted on being fu prepared for any emergency. He marched under a avy load of two cameras, a Baedeker, an English-A bic dictionary, a jack-knife with numerous handy to s concealed about it, a variety of medicines, and a useum of other first-aids. For defense, a young ca on in the shape of a Colt automatic hung at his be e planned to start at sunrise, and we got off about as arly as we expected, that is, about eight o'clock. A Arabic proverb says: "Starting is half the jo ney."

hat commodity with which we were most sl derly equipped was the Arabic language. It is ther difficult to issue orders to your muleteer w n your vocabulary is still limited to the terms of reeting and farewell and solemn wishes for the h th of a fictitious friend, which constitute y early lessons in a strange tongue. Moreover, o dictionary proved to be a broken reed. It fr uently remained ingloriously mute when re rted to in times of desperate need, while our fo anticipations of sitting around our campfire a accumulating Arabic by means of delightful c versation between ourselves, Mustafa, and the di onary, did not entirely materialize.

TURNING southward, we skirted the mound on which the ruins of a Crusader castle stand, pa ed the heap of shells and crossed the Flea R er. The name is not without significance, th gh why the characteristic national insect sh ld be honored only by the name of this little st am in one part of his realm is difficult to say. Th shell heap is reminiscent of the days when Si n possessed a flourishing trade from the m ufacture of the royal purple. Here are myriads of the murex shells, fished up in forgotten days from the depths of the sea in order that the linen garments of the great should have a royal hue.

We followed the coast road southward for several hours, passing the Sarepta Point, a jutting cape. There is no sign of a village now at the place, which, to the best of our knowledge, marks the northern limits of the journeyings of the Man of Galilee. We then turned our faces toward the hills.

Banias, formerly called Paneas, but in the time of Christ Cæsarea Philippi, near the source of the Jordan, 120 miles from Jerusalem, where the Master asked, "Whom say ye that I am?"

After topping the first rise we saw other hills rolling away into the distant blue, with the white head of Hermon gleaming far beyond. What held our attention most was a sharply defined mass that stood out distinctly against the sky on a distant ridge. That was Belfort. We walked steadily toward it all day. At times we dipped down into valleys and lost it, only to meet it again a little nearer and more distinct. We reached our destination late in the afternoon.

Belfort is situated on the heights above the Litany River, where that stream turns abruptly from its course between the Lebanons and flows westward to the sea. One approaches the castle from the coastward side by long ascents through fields and orchards, but the castle itself stands on a precipitous height with the green waters of the wrestling Litany far below. Beyond, the land rises again toward the majesty of Hermon. It is a fruitful region and exceedingly pleasant to look upon. The ruinous castle, with its historic associations of Saracen and Templar, stirs the imagination to recreate the picturesque days gone by.

After a swim in the river we camped on the slope opposite the castle among olive trees. It was a pleasant night; the moonlight filtered through the olive leaves, the voice of the river came up from below, and on the opposite heights the broken towers of the castle stood sturdily against the sky.

OUR early morning's march swung us around the hills and down through broad valleys, southward into the region of the upper Jordan. In the distance gleamed a bit of blue, the marshy Lake Huleh, fameless father of the Sea of Galilee, half eclipsed by a grove of poplars. Lake Huleh was as elusive as a mirage. The barren hills on our right marched by us with satisfying regularity, but the lake shimmered before us in the glowing heat and seemed to draw no nearer. We passed it in the late afternoon, and, turning to the right, began to ascend the hills, a welcome relief from the tiresome monotony of the plain.

During the day we observed that Mustafa had made an important religious concession since the day before. It was the month of Ramadan, when no good Moslem is supposed to eat, drink or smoke during daylight hours, that is, from the first light of dawn until sunset. On the first day of the journey Mustafa neither ate nor drank, and his temper, in consequence, was neither Moslem nor Christian; but on this day we saw him eating his native bread and absorbing moisture from every wayside spring. Travelers and invalids are exempt from keeping the strict laws of the fast if they so desire, and can make up the lost time afterward. Evidently our friend had decided to do so. We would have liked to discuss the matter with him, but as already pointed out, our vocabularies were strictly limited, so far as terms expressing religious theory and practice were concerned.

At sunset we passed through a notch in the upper hills, and the white houses of Safed stood over against us. It was dark when we passed through the narrow streets and entered the hospitable doors of the English mission.

Safed is one of the four holy cities of the Jews. A great rabbinical school flourished here in the seventeenth century. Safed is holy because, according to Jewish tradition, from this city is yet to come the Messiah, the Anointed.

IT was on a late Friday afternoon, as we were returning from a walk to visit some nameless ruins on a neighboring hill-top, that we observed that in the Jewish quarter of the town lights were beginning to shine from the windows, although the sun was not yet set. These were the houses of the ultra-orthodox Jews, for the most part exiles from Poland. To avoid breaking the Sabbath, which begins at sunset, they light their lamps early. Of course they dare not extinguish them at bedtime, so a Gentile neighbor is called in for that purpose. No work of any kind is done on the Sabbath if it

A typical party of missionary-teachers after a night on Mount Hermon can be avoided, and even where it is unavoidable the Moslem or Christian neighbor makes a convenient proxy.

The Sabbath day's journey is a very real thing for these people. All the roads and paths leading out of the city are marked at the prescribed distance, so that the faithful may not sin in straying too far on his rambles: Any one walking about on the Sabbath is forbidden to carry a burden of any sort, even a key. If he feels the need of that more or less necessary article, a pocket handkerchief, he may not carry it in his pocket, for that would be carrying a burden; he must wear it as an article of dress tied around his neck or on his arm.

ONE morning we rose long before dawn and started northward while Orion and the Pleiades were still shining in the eastern sky. Reaching the head of the Jordan Valley, we turned eastward toward a great mountain and the sources of the Jordan. Toward sunset we came to the mound and poplar grove that marks the site of ancient Dan. Here is the most important source of the Jordan, the greatest fountain of all Syria. The burning heat of the day had created a thirst of no small proportions. If Gideon had been in command he would have called me no sort of a soldier, for I lay prone and thrust my whole face in the cooling stream.

This stream and mound mark the site of one of the bloodiest deeds recorded in that chronicle of conquest, the Book of Judges. The tribe of Dan, seeking more territory, "came unto Laish, unto a people quiet and secure, and smote them with the edge of the sword; and they burnt the city with fire. And there was no deliverer. . . . And they built the city and dwelt therein."

It was dark when we came to Banias, formerly called Paneas, since it was the seat of the worship of Pan. Cæsarea Philippi is the name by which it was known in the time of Christ. We passed the wretched modern village which is built almost entirely within the ruins of the lower castle and went on a short distance to the Springs of Pan, which burst forth from a grotto beneath a towering cliff. Here were abundant ruins of former shrines and niches, shell-shaped, carved in the rock. So much we could make out in the darkness; further exploration was deferred for daylight hours.

WE spent the next morning exploring the castle on the upper slopes, the circuit of whose walls is nearly a mile in length. There is a mass of ruined buildings at either end of the enclosure, with strong towers along the walls between. In one place we found the lower part of a tower still complete. Here were massive walls, with narrow embrasures, where the archers stood to rain down their shafts on the hosts of the enemy below.

The rest of the day was devoted to cruel hard mountain climbing. At times we almost despaired of getting the donkey up the steep slopes, and we were frequently obliged to put our shoulders to the wheel, metaphorically speaking. As we neared Shiba, the village where we were to encamp, we saw on the high shoulder of a mountain spur a black band that seemed to follow the configuration of the limestone strata. I confided to George my immediate conviction that we had discovered an outcropping of coal and were about to become famous, but George in his dispassionate way pointed out the fact that the coal stratum seemed to be in motion. On closer investigation it proved to be a line of black goats, hundreds of them, marching homeward from their feeding grounds along a high projecting ledge.

Shiba is a village of very free and independent mountaineers, Christians, well up in the wrinkled foothills of Hermon. It is a natural stronghold, since it can be approached only through a narrow valley, and the mountaineers are exceedingly well capable of taking care of themselves. In bearing and appearance they are vastly different from the slovenly inhabitants of the upper Jordan valley.

We pushed on through the village and camped by a little stream so cold that we had difficulty in persuading our feet to enter it and be bathed. It was the harvest season, and the villagers seemed to be holding a continual Feast of Tabernacles. Booths were erected in the fields and among the fruit trees everywhere: lights gleamed through the dusk, and there was a cheerful sound of human voices on all sides.

Old gate to Cæsarea Philippi, at the foot of Mount Hermon

We set out next morning for the mountain top, and after a five hours' climb we reached the summit of the upper ridge and then proceeded along Hermon's backbone to the northern extremity, which marks the highest point, some 9,050 feet above the sea.

Here we found the scattered ruins of a temple and a place of sacrifice. All about, the ground was covered with old ashes, containing quantities of fragments of bones. Near by was a cave, partly artificial in nature. This was probably the more primitive placo of worship.

The view ranged from the Mediterranean on the west to Jebel Druse and the wilderness on the east; from the farther reaches of Lebanon, Cœle-Syria and the Anti-Lebanon to the hills of Samaria and the lower Jordan valley. Huleh and Galilee were within the range of vision, but we tried in vain to descry the distant blue of the Sea of Death.

A great contrast exists between the eastern and the western landscape. Toward the sea were fertile fields, groves and orchards, with white villages scattered thickly in the folds of the landscape. Desertward the land was gaunt and lifeless, with hardly a village visible. In the valleys of the foothills the slender streams had been diverted at their sources and carried in ditches along the slopes to be used for irrigation ver down. We traced the lines of the ditches in the me way that astronomers claim to be able to trac the canals of Mars—by the thin lines of vegetation ong tho banks.

In the northeast the dipper-shaped city of Dam us with its environment of gardens was plainly vi le. We tried to locate the line of the Pilgrimage Rai ad running southward from that city tc ard Medina, but were unable to find it.

As the sun descended toward the Me erranean the shadow of the mountain beg to creep out from the foothills and stretch a oss the land. Darkness descended on us whi we were cooking our supper. We found a sc of sinkhole some twenty feet in depth fo our bedroom. The bottom was level and com sed of soft earth, free from stones. Here we wra ped ourselves up snugly in our blankets. Mu afa was delegated to act as our alarm clock an get us up in time to see the sunrise from the ak. He evidently conceived of himself as a repe ng instrument, for he woke us up first at midr ht, and then encored himself at frequent inte ls, insisting on each occasion that the day as at hand.

AT about four o'clock we climbed up o of the crater in which we had made our ds, broke the ice that had formed overnight o he stream that flows from the edge of the snow nd cooked a hasty breakfast; then went up t he ancient altar to wait for the creation of a ew day. As the light increased, we saw tha he land to the eastward was covered with a vel lair of fleecy white clouds; above this th un rose in ineffable glory. We turned and sav he shadow of Hermon projected on the haze a ve the Mediterranean. The peak of the sh ow drew down and rested on the sea, then l an swiftly to cross the land. White villages nd gleaming pools of water flashed suddenly i he new light.

Shiba was reached without mishap sh ly after noon. The afternoon was unevei ul, except for the fact that our water supply o ne small jar carried by the white donkey soon ve out, and we nearly evaporated under the n's fierce heat until we came quite suddenly on the Hasbaney and considerably diminishc its flow. That night we camped out in a real bec nd enjoyed the pleasure of a dinner cooked by c er and more skilful hands than ours, for we had f en into the hands of our friends the American mis naries at their summer home in the village of Judo h.

The program for our last day was very simple It was to walk and to keep on walking till we rea ed Sidon. Near Belfort Castle we took the old roa by which we had come. We had time, so when a seag ng chariot called a "bosta," bound for Sidon, hov in view, we gaily flung our pedestrian principles to he winds and boarded her.

Among the remarkable ruins that we met I sh ld not fail to chronicle the two horses that walke in front. Even when in full flight they were oblige to lean up against each other for support. The d er assured us that we would be in Sidon by sunset ut ho was merely exercising the far-famed Ori al imagination, for it was nearly two o'clock whe ve came to anchor in the midst of the familiar smell at hovers round a city of the East, though we had st an hour in helping to pry loose a carriage horse at had fallen off the road among the hills and had lo ed upside down in a narrow wash-out.

It was still the month of Ramadan, and the ba rs were lighted and filled with people gathered in frie ly groups, eating the early meal that was to ceas as soon as it would be light enough to distinguish a b k thread from a white. The scene was strangely plea ng and inviting, but the power of sleep was upon us, d we passed on through devious ways till we paused d pulled the bell cord before a well-known door.

THE HILL

The climbing was difficult.
The earth trembled and shook.
Huge rocks and giant trees tottered, then crashed down.
Tumultuously tossed masses of smoke hid the sun.
Through this chaos he climbed stealthily.
He fired steadily—into the air.

His thoughts were ever on home; his loved wife; his two pretty children.
He loved peace. He loved even his enemies.
He had not volunteered. He had been drafted.
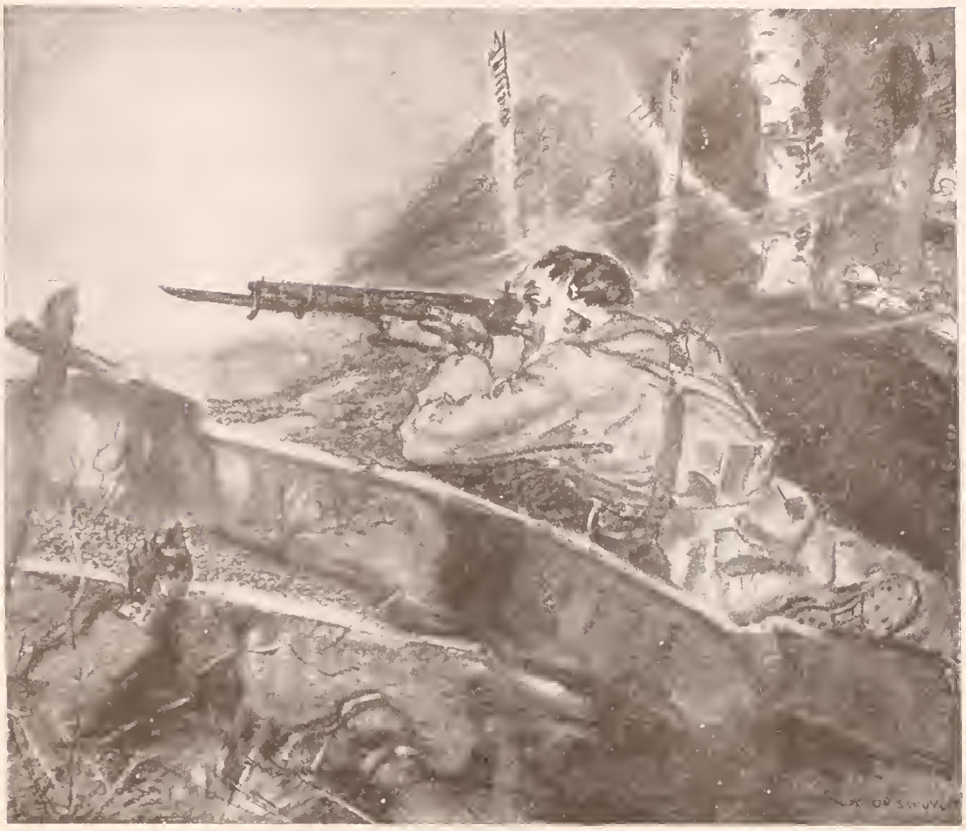
Three months ago he had been badly wounded; sent home.
Now he was back again in this mill of death.

Later, there on the crest, they found him, dead.
"There (on the hill) they crucified him."



"THERE THEY CRUCIFIED HIM." St. Luke 23:33

Weighing Men Against Sheep

ONE of the surest signs of spring is the cropping out upon street corners of our big cities, especially about the noon hour, of small compact groups of men, sometimes of wo n, listening to an outdoor orator. These, in the cas of religious workers at any rate, soon develop in a m titude of forms: tent meetings, noon-hour shopme ngs, vacation Bible schools, seaside evangelistic wor and others; and every reasonable hour of day and ight is utilized by this summer army of the Lord. The summer campaigns in the big cities, in reality but n extension in a freer way of the steady activities f the winter, have now become an institution. An yet, confronting the various leaders in the various citi is the bewildering fact that the churches are by o means occupying the field to its full possibilities It would be an excellent thing, both for the chu hes and for this splendid Christian work, this all- portant Christian work, if the remarks made by Ev gelist William Edward Biederwolf at the opening ally of the New York Evangelistic Committee at C rnegie Hall on April 24 could be heard by every city Christian. And the effects might be doubled if eve Christian living in the country could also hear wha Mr. Biederwolf said. The fact is not quite app ent that the Christians who live far from these citi have any less responsibility in this work than tho who are right on the scene. The city evangelists nd missionaries and tent preachers and sidewalk spe ers send their message into the audiences that gat r before them hit or miss, and the statistics wou seem to indicate that among the thousands wh are hit to their everlasting good are as many cou ry-born and country-bred boys and girls, who hav not been able to withstand the evil side of the city influence, as there are sons of immigrants and chil en of the slums.

T E New York Evangelistic Committee, of which Rev. Arthur J. Smith is the superintendent, alw s gives this work in the metropolis a great imp us by its spring rally. Carnegie Hall held a larg and sympathetic audience on the night of April 24, nd all the organizations engaged in this form of Chr tian service will doubtless share with the commit e the benefits derived. With just a hope that the message which hewed so close to the line may hav some effect upon this kind of work in other citi we give here a few extracts taken down by a rep sentative of the Christian Herald who was pre nt.

MR. BIEDERWOLF immediately put his audience in good humor by stating in no uncertain ter his opinion of the Darwinian theory as compar with the story in the inspired Book. He said: "M n has always been pretty much of a puzzle to him lf, and he has never been quite certain where he as going; but there are a few people who are so smart that God can't tell them anything. There are people who would hesitate at the Apostles Creed and will not confess that they believe in God Almighty who are willing to believe in a chaotic nebula. According to them, man came from a germ that came from God only knows where, and Charles Darwin couldn't find out. It may be all right to believe that a monkey, a mastodon, a mouse, a mosquito and a man all came from the same process; but I prefer to believe that God created man in his own image and breathed into the insensate lump of clay the breath of life, just as it says in the Book. A man can believe that he is descended from a monkey if he wants to, but, so believing, he need not come around and claim relationship with William Biederwolf. What a man is is worth infinitely more than what a man owus. Christ died for every man: the libertine, the liar, the thief, the cheat, and every other man. Man has a soul and a soul has wings; and by the help of God I am going to live for higher things. According to Christ's philosophy, one man is worth just as much as another; not in money or social standing or character, because most of us have a better reputation than we deserve. All the devils in hell and all the evil-minded persons on earth assembled in a convention couldn't invent a more damnable thing than the saloon; yet the saloonkeeper is worth as much as a saint from God's standpoint and in his eyes. Many men are more concerned about the 'bulls and bears' than they are about the lambs in their own households. I can only judge by what you give yourselves to. That which holds your passionate interest is the thing that marks you, and the average church member has a passion for almost anything but souls."

TO illustrate this he told of a young father and mother who stood over a cradle in which their firstborn slept. The mother looked down with loving prophecy in her eyes. She saw the child grown to a man, fighting in the open forum for truth; she saw him marked a leader of men. She visualized the hero of her dreams, and looking up at her husband she said, "Isn't he wonderful?" The husband said, "Yes, but what I've been wondering is, how they could make a cradle like that for a dollar ninety-eight." Mr. Biederwolf asked how long it would take to evangelize the country when the average church increase on confession of faith was 1½ per cent. at the same time that the population increased 2½ per cent. He said: "If fifty people out of a church membership of 250 would seek to win a soul once a week, and if they failed in nine attempts out of ten, that church would nevertheless increase 260 in membership in one year, and that is more than 100 per cent. The church is a sepulchre of death if she does not go out to seek the lost." He told an incident in the life of John Vassar. Upon one occasion Mr. Vassar was introduced to a lady in the drawing-room of a friend, and his first question was "Are you a Christian?" to which the lady gave ready assent. Then he asked "Are you born again?" and when he found that she could not give an assuredly affirmative answer to that question, he talked and prayed with her. Later the woman told her husband what a wonderful man she had met. Both she and her husband were thus quickened in their spiritual life. Mr. Biederwolf said that he was often accused of being paid too highly for his work. As a part of the exhibit of the work of the Evangelistic Committee, several converts told of the means and manner of their conversion, and of their love for the Christ who had saved them. The most striking was George Ellis, who for a number of years had given all his time and talents to the service of the devil with results which should have been entirely satisfactory to that arch-fiend himself, results which included for George Ellis intimate experiences with the inside of many prisons. But one night he drifted into the Midnight Mission and was saved. Mr. Ellis told graphically of his life of sin and of his conversion and the work which he was now doing in carrying the message of salvation to others such as he had been. He said he thanked God for the Midnight Mission. Then he hesitated a second, and continued: "I thank God, too, because he gave me a good wife and t'rowed in four kids for good measure."

Henry Ford On Preparedness

SOUNDED on his political opinions, Henry Ford's frank and modest utterances on the war and preparedness are attracting attention. It develops that he is not the rank out-and-out pacifist his critics have pictured. He believes Germany acted within her rights in sinking unarmed merchantmen and passenger vessels, and questions the sanity, or at least the reasonableness, of Americans who choose to travel on such enemy ships in war-time. A ship which is known to carry munitions of war he regards as not entitled to be classed as unarmed. Passing to our own attitude as a nation, he believes we do not need a big army or navy, but we should have sufficient submarines for any emergency. The submarines have made the old dreadnought obsolete. They have kept the big European fleets bottled up and practically useless. With a good reliable fleet of small submarines, we could bid defiance to invading dreadnoughts and transports. They could be built by the thousand and would be ample for all purposes of defense. Airships, too, would be a valuable part of the national defense. His own plant could build thousands of them. Mr. Ford smiles when his name is mentioned in connection with a Presidential nomination. He doesn't believe in the man seeking the office; the people should seek the man. But the political bosses do not smile when they discuss the quiet, unostentatious man who seems likely to become a figure in national politics in spite of himself.

JAPAN DEFENDS HER HONOR. It is a serious affront to the honor of a nation of the first class when another nation refuses admittance to its citizens, as such. Japan, especially since her defeat of Russia, has felt herself entitled to recognition as a first-class power. On the other hand the fact remains that American and European workmen cannot compete in the open market with Japanese workmen. When Elihu Root was Secretary of State, feeling upon the western coast was insistent upon the exclusion of Japanese laborers as well as Chinese. Japan interposed a vigorous objection, and the result was the withdrawal of all pending measures in Congress and the signing of the Root-Takahira agreement. It was a gentleman's agreement without the force of law, in which Japan agreed not to issue passports to laborers desiring to come to this country, thus excluding her own sons from America, although American law still left them free to enter. This agreement Japan has kept scrupulously. The Burnett Immigration Bill, which passed the House recently, and which is now pending in the Senate, contained a clause definitely excluding "Hindus and persons who cannot become eligible under existing law to become citizens of the United States by naturalization, unless otherwise provided for by existing agreements as to passports or by existing treaties, conventions or agreements, or by treaties, conventions or agreements that hereafter may be entered into." This clause would have had the effect of enacting into law the Root-Takahira agreement, thereby definitely excluding the Japanese, although they are not specified by name. The Japanese government, through Ambassador Chinda, immediately upon the passage of the Burnett bill in the House made representations to the American government, requesting that the reference be eliminated from the bill. Acting at the request of Secretary Lansing, the Senate Committee changed the law to read "persons who cannot become eligible under existing law to become citizens of the United States by naturalization, unless otherwise provided for by existing agreements as to passports or by existing treaties, conventions or agreements, or by treaties, conventions or agreements that may hereafter be entered into. Hindus . . ." The clause is still unsatisfactory to Japan because in its present form it will have the same force and effect as in its original form, and it is probable that all reference to agreements as to passports, et cetera, will be omitted from the bill, or that, if it is still included, it will furnish an obvious reason for the veto, which is expected with reasonable certainty in any case. After his return to Japan following his recent tour of the United States, Baron Shibusawa said:

" Owing to a lack of thorough understanding on both sides of the Pacific, the two nations are dangerously drifting apart.'

"It is the ardent hope and belief of myself and others eager to maintain the friendly relations of America with Japan for the good of both that Baron Chinda's appeal to the President will be effectual and that the offensive clause will be stricken from the Immigration bill. We Japanese have confidence in President Wilson and are sure that he will do all in his power to prevent this unnecessary and gratuitous affront to the Japanese people."

DYESTUFFS FROM GERMANY. After negotiations covering several months, the German government agreed early in April to permit the exportation to the United States of 15,000 tons of dyestuffs, of which American industry was greatly in need. The German government at first refused to permit the shipment except in exchange for American goods, but finally, in view of the difficulties attendant upon such an exchange, agreed to permit the export of the dyestuffs without conditions. The consent of Great Britain to the shipment had not been obtained at last reports.

DECLINES NEW YORK POSTOFFICE. State Senator Robert F. Wagner of New York City was nominated for postmaster of New York City by the President on April 22 but refused to accept the appointment. Senator Wagner was the leader of the Democratic minority in the New York Legislature the last session.

JOSIAH STRONG DIES. Dr. Josiah Strong, who became famous with the publication of his book "Our Country" in 1885, died at his home in New York City after a serious illness of several weeks on April 28. Dr. Strong was born at Naperville, Ill., January 19, 1847. He was a graduate of Western Reserve College and of Lane Theological Seminary, and was ordained to the Congregational ministry in 1871. Although the author of many successful books, he was best known, however, in connection with social service work. He was president of the League for Social Service from 1898-1902.

TO PROMOTE AGRICULTURE. James Wilson, whose name has become inseparably linked up with American agriculture through his long tenure of office as Secretary of Agriculture, is actively interested in the organization of the National Agricultural Society, which was formed on April 27 at the Hotel Biltmore, in New York. The society is organized to improve agricultural conditions throughout the country. Permanent headquarters will eventually be established at Washington. Present headquarters are at 2 West Forty-fifth Street, New York City.

FOG GROWS JEALOUS OF WAR. The steamer Hsin-Yu, acting as a Chinese transport, was in collision south of the Chusan Islands on April 22 with the Chinese cruiser Hai-Yung. The collision occurred during a thick fog, and only thirty of the steamer's crew and passengers were saved. At least a thousand were drowned.

POLICE POWERS EXCEEDED. The ordinance recently adopted by a ferendum vote in St. Louis, providi for the segregation of whites and bla s in different portions of the city, ar rdinance which sought justification ider the ever-widening police powers the city, has been halted in its enforc ient by a temporary injunction grant by Judge Dyer of the United State District Court. The judge stated in gr ting the injunction that the questi of police power is "sharply drawn, it I believe that these ordinances exce the police powers. A man has a ri to occupy property that he owns und the laws of the United States and th onstitution."

THE EXAGGERATOR BARRED. The Supreme Court of the United Sta on April 24 rendered a decision to the fect that advertising is dishonest if it ads purchasers to expect more than the get, even though the values delivere are commensurate with the price cha ed. This decision will exclude from the ails a great deal of fraudulent material The opinion was a reversal of the D rict Court of Southern Florida, whic had quashed an indictment against c ain persons charged with the unlawf use of the mails in selling ten-acre ms. Justice McKenna, who rendere the decision, took the position that it v an offense if the article sold did not rve the purpose represented, no matte hat the value might be. He said: " ere 'puffing' might not be within its m ing (referring to the statute); that i the mere exaggeration of the qualities ich the article has; but when a pro sed seller goes beyond that, assigns t the article qualities which it does not possess, does not simply magni in opinion the advantages which it ha but invents advantages and falsely ag-gerates their existence, and enga in false representations and pret ses. . . . when the pretenses or repre ta-tions or promises which execut the deception and fraud are false, hey become the scheme or artifice ich the statute denounces." No repu ble magazine and few reputable news pers carry this class of advertising. But there has been a twilight zone bet een strict probity in statement and hat was admittedly fraudulent unde the statute which has been taken full advantage of by persons selling th igh the mails. This decision will go a ong way toward clearing the mails all frauds.

REVOLT AND RESIGNATION. ian Shi Kai became emperor agains his will, at the mandate of the Cl ese people, and when he found tha the mandate had been somewhat lacki in that full force and effect which s uld accrue to an expression of the po lar will, he became resigned to the ess ornate title of president. ork of Congress. The regular b ness of the nation is beginning to re ive serious attention at the hands of ongress. On April 21 after three d s' debate, the Senate defeated the B khead Good Roads Bill by the pr ess of not bringing it to a vote. T bill would have appropriated $7000,000 in five years to be used w an equal amount contributed by the states in the building of good ro s. On the 22d the Senate by a v of 59 to 10 accepted the House bi continuing the present import d of one cent a pound on sugar. O April 24 the Rural Credits Bill was ta n up and discussed in the Senate. It w announced on April 24 that the N al Affairs Committee of the House would report on the Naval Appropriation Bill, carrying nearly $250,000,000, which would provide for six capital ships, two dreadnoughts, and four battle cruisers. The bill provides for an increase of 15,500 men in the personnel of the navy; for the construction of a plant for the manufacture of projectiles; for a large increase in the stock of ammunition; for the construction of dry docks at Philadelphia and at Norfolk, and the bill will appropriate a million dollars for the construction of a research laboratory for the Edison Advisory Board, and two million dollars for aviation. On April 25 the Rules Committee of the House reported a special rule to discharge the Military Committee from further consideration of the Army Bill and to permit the Speaker to appoint House conferees. The bill was sent to conference by a vote of 208 to 146. An attempt failed to instruct the House conferees to accept the Senate provision for a larger army.

Electric Locomotive Conquers the Divide. The work of electrifying 440 miles of track of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway across the Great Continental Divide is now approaching completion; 115 miles are now operating by electricity. The power is generated at Great Falls, Montana.

A Governor's Job. The New York State Legislature adjourned on April 21, having sent to the executive 260 measures prior to adjournment, and leaving 537 in his hands for consideration. The Greiner Bill, providing for the daily reading of the Scripture in the public schools, failed of passage in the Senate by one vote. Of the bills passed, the one of most general interest provides for physical and military training in the public schools, a bill inspired by the nation-wide campaign for preparedness.

Ireland Rebels. Vague rumors of a possible uprising in Ireland came to a head on April 25 when it was announced that some time between the 20th and 22d a German ship carrying munitions had been destroyed off the coast of Ireland and Sir Roger Casement and two companions had been captured. It later developed that Sir Roger, who had been in Germany since the outbreak of the war and who had endeavored to secure recruits for the German arms among Irish prisoners in the prison camps in Germany, had been set ashore in Ireland from a German submarine which had convoyed the ammunition ship. Coincidental with the capture of Sir Roger, a revolutionary outbreak of considerable proportions occurred in Dublin and the surrounding counties. Irish volunteers belonging to the Sinn Fein Society and to the Separatist faction, of which Sir Roger was leader, took possession of Stephen Green, the Post Office, Sackville Street, Abbey Street and a number of the public buildings at Dublin on Easter Monday. Martial law was at once declared. British regulars were sent to Dublin from Belfast and from the military camps in England. The whole disaffected area in Ireland was put under the command of Major-General Sir John Maxwell. In the first day's fighting, in which the troops gained the upper hand at Dublin, twelve soldiers were killed and serious losses were inflicted upon the rebels, the extent of these losses not being ascertainable. Later reports showed that the revolt was spreading west and south from Dublin, and the British troops were attacking the public buildings in Dublin with artillery. On April 30, the main body of rebels in Dublin surrendered, but at last reports other bodies still held points of vantage in the city, and the trouble was by no means over, either in Dublin or in the counties. The revolution was disavowed in the House of Commons by Mr. John Redmond, leader of the Irish Nationalists, and by Sir Edward Carson, Unionist leader, both of whom agreed that the revolution did not represent the feeling of a majority of the people of Ireland. Sir Roger Casement was taken to London and imprisoned in the Tower charged with high treason. He expressed the opinion that without him the rebellion could not possibly succeed.

Marking Time In Mexico. The President decided on April 23 to hold the American troops just where they were in Mexico pending developments. A rearrangement of forces suggested by General Pershing and recommended by General Funston was ordered; but, aside from policing the bandit-infested area along the line of communications, no active pursuit of the Villistas was to be undertaken. Arrangements were made for General Scott and General Obregon to meet at El Paso or Juarez, and to discuss all the questions at issue between the two governments. It was expected that General Obregon would seek the immediate withdrawal of the American expedition on the plea that the Villista organization had been dispersed and that the Carranza troops would now be able to control the situation. Evidence continues to accumulate that Villa is still alive, but apparently neither Americans nor Carranzistas have definite information as to his whereabouts. On April 22 Colonel Dodd's column engaged a force of Villistas near Tomachic. The American troopers, though outnumbered, drove the enemy to the hills. The American loss was two dead and three wounded. The known loss of Villistas was six killed and sixteen wounded. The column under Major Howze which reinforced Major Tompkins made a record ride for American cavalry before reaching Santa Cruz. Major Howze with 208 men left the base at San Geronimo on April 4, and covered 570 miles in 21 days, in which time no rations were drawn. They had several brushes with the Villistas, just avoided an engagement with a force of Carranza cavalry, and lost one man killed.

The War in Europe

PARLIAMENT held a secret session on Tuesday, April 25, at which the result of the compromise re hed by the cabinet in regard to th conscription problem was laid be re them and agreed to. According to statement afterwards made by th government this compromise contemplates the continuance of the volun ry system until May 27, when, if 5000 men are not raised by this means, fu conscription will be introduced. If ese 50,000 are raised, the voluntary sy m will be continued, provided 1 00 men per week are thereafter ra d, but if the recruiting falls below th figure of 15,000 per week for any co ecutive weeks, then also there will b conscription. Submarine activity, th gh in a minor degree, has continued th ughout the week and several neutr merchant ships have been lost th ugh striking mines, the Dutch and N wegians being particularly unfortu te.

uring the past week the east coasts of reat Britain have been three times ra d by Zeppelins, the most importa of which raids was on the Norfo coast on April 25, a few hours before an attack by German cruisers on the coast towns of Yarmouth and Lowestoft. The results of these raids are problematic, one side giving one version, and the other side another as usual, but in any event there do not seem to have been a very large number of casualties.

The German cruiser raid on the above mentioned towns took place about 4:30 in the morning. Both towns were bombarded for about twenty minutes, when, British naval forces appearing, the Germans drew off and retreated, and a running fight ensued wherein two British auxiliary vessels were severely hit and a submarine, the E2, was lost. The damage to the towns bombarded was slight, according to the British report, and the casualties were small, four only being killed. In the naval fight one of the British auxiliary vessels hit was the King Stephen, which will possibly be remembered as the vessel whose captain some time ago refused to rescue the crew of the Zeppelin L19 in the North Sea some time ago.

On April 24, the British squadron made an attack on the German naval base on the Belgium coast at Zeebrugge. According to Dutch reports the bombardment was the longest and heaviest in this region during the war, and considerable damage is said to have been done. The attacking fleet was reported to have suffered considerably from the fire of the shore batteries and German naval vessels.

Great Britain has replied during the week to the American protest on her interference with American commerce with neutral nations, sent to her last November, or six months ago. (See page 599.) The United States has also addressed a further note to Great Britain relative to the 38 Germans taken from an American steamer in the Pacific, informing Great Britain that her reply to the original American note of protest is not regarded as satisfactory and repeating its demand for the release of the men so taken.

On Tuesday the British battleship Russell, commissioned in 1903, of 14,000 tons burden, was sunk in the Mediterranean, where she was stationed as the flagship of Admiral Freemantle, the oldest admiral, 80, in active service in the British navy. The Russell was of the pre-dreadnought type, and while a useful vessel was not of the first importance. It is supposed her sinking was caused by a mine; about 125 of the ship's company of 826 were lost.

An important action took place Sunday, April 23, in Mesopotamia. After a heavy bombardment of the Turkish at Sannaiyat, on the north bank of the Tigris, for two days the British made a general assault with English troops in the lead. Their rush was at first successful and the Turkish first and second lines were penetrated, but the Turkish counter-attack was too strong and the British were thrown back and forced to the rear of the positions from which they started. London fears that the losses were heavy, though nothing is said concerning them in the despatch from General Lake announcing the repulse.

The surrender of the British under General Townshend, who had been besieged at Kut-el-Amara for 143 days, was announced on April 30. General Townshend, after a disastrous victory over the Turks at Ctesiphon, weakened by losses in action and facing a greatly

The Harness of a Soldier

*By DAVID JAMES BURRELL, D.D., LL.D.

TEXT—Eph. 6: 13-17. "Wherefore take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand. Stand therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breastplate of righteousness; and your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace; above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God." Read also I Sam. 17:38.

WE are living in martial days. Now and then a fond mother says: "I didn't raise my boy to be a soldier"; but it is impossible to escape the responsibility of soldiership. Not that we should be belligerent like those of whom one has said, "They are hatched from cannon-balls as eagles are from eggs." But life is a battle: "We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." We are hearing much of national "preparedness," but personal preparedness is the matter before us. The campaign is on, inescapably on, and it is the part of wisdom to be equipped for it.

In our two texts (I Sam. 17: 38 and Eph. 6: 13-17) we are introduced to two scenes in camp. One is in the royal pavilion in the Valley of Elah where the armies of the Israelites and the Philistines are drawn up in battle array. King Saul is putting his own armor upon a farmer's boy, a "ruddy youth," who had come into the camp that morning and volunteered to go out single-handed against the champion of Philistia. Now Saul was a man of stalwart build, "from his shoulders and upward higher than all the people," while David was a mere stripling. The king's helmet slipped over his ears; the mail-coat was roomy enough for two, and the long sword trailed and clattered after him. Wherefore he said, "I cannot go with these," and straightway put them off.

The other scene is in Ephesus, a thousand years later. A young man, not unlike David, the pastor of the Ephesian church, has received a letter from Paul, his spiritual father and predecessor in the pastorate. He breaks the seal and finds the scroll full of wise counsels and admonitions. For Paul knows well the dangers to which Timothy and his flock, "a feeble folk like the conies," are exposed in this idolatrous city. "Put ye on the whole armor of God," reads the young pastor, "that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand." And at this point he braces himself with resolution and proceeds to equip himself with the harness of a Christian soldier, piece by piece, as provided in the divine armory. No such panoply as Saul's is here suggested: for "the weapons of our warfare are not carnal but spiritual." Forged by no human hand, adjusted by no careful squire, they fit all souls alike for a strenuous life.

FIRST, there is the helmet of salvation. This before all. The memory of a mislived past is a hopeless handicap in the struggle. It is like dragging a ball and chain in an Isthmian race. And why should any be thus hampered, under the shadow of the Cross? "Look and live!" To believe in Christ is to be delivered from the past. "Come now and let us reason together, saith the Lord: though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." Gone! Gone! "As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us." Blotted out! Sunk in the depths of the unfathomable sea of oblivion, so that our sins are "remembered no more against us!"

This, I say, is the very beginning of our equipment. We have a thousand doubts and ten thousand perplexities, but all await the settlement of the primal question, "What must I do to be saved?" Having Christ, we have the solution of all. He is our Alpha; the other letters of the alphabet all follow it.

The waving plume of this helmet is more than an ornament; it waves like a challenge in the face of the foe. "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth? Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died; yea rather that is risen again; who is even at the right hand of God; who also maketh intercession for us!"

THE second piece of armor provided for us is the breastplate of righteousness. This is the coat of mail: the uniform which every puissant knight is expected to put on. In the Christian life, this uniform is not profession but practice, the practice of righteousness, which is rightness with God. If you were going to enlist in the American army you would don the uniform as a matter of course. And there would be no difference. A rich man's son and a hod-carrier look alike in the ranks. No soldier blushes for his khaki. It is only timid Christians who occasionally prefer to serve unrecognized. The name Christian is an intimation of righteousness, as the Master said, "By this shall a man know that ye are my disciples, if ye do whatsoever I command you."

There are two kinds of righteousness. One is referred to by Paul as "mine own righteousness, which is of the law": and this is that of which Isaiah says, "All our righteousnesses are as filthy rags." The other is designated as "the righteousness which is of God by faith in Jesus Christ" (Phil. 3: 9), and this is that "fine linen clean and white" in which all guests are arrayed at the marriage of the King's Son. This sort of righteousness comes by the imputation of Christ to those who have put off self and accepted him as their Savior and their all.

THE third piece of armor is the girdle of truth. Its importance is manifest, inasmuch as it binds and fastens all. The whole harness would be loose and rickety without it.

One of the ominous signs of our time is the disposition to cavil at truth. And the result is seen in a doctrinal and ethical looseness which usually parades under the guise of "liberalism." They say, "It makes no difference what a man believes if only he lives an upright life": which is much like saying, "The foundation is of no consequence so long as the house looks well."

There are three old-fashioned words which are greatly discounted in these days. One of them is the word "creed," which is derived from the Latin credo, "I believe." But what is a man worth without a creed? Would you trust a grocer who did not believe that it takes sixteen ounces to make a pound? Would you vote for a politician who did not believe in the postulates which underlie all just government? Belief is literally "the thing a man lives by." Water cannot rise above the level of its source. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he."

Another of the discredited words that have been smeared with phosphorus and put in the pillory of our time is "dogma." And what is a dogma? Nothing but a truth with authority behind it. Biblical dogma has the divine authority behind it. My personal opinion as to the problems of the spiritual life is of little consequence to you; but what God says is not to be lightly spoken of. A "thus saith the Lord" is final for those who truly love him.

And the last of the stigmatized words is "orthodoxy." This literally means "straight teaching," that is, straight from the throne of God. And because the carnal mind is enmity against God it is no wonder that the word in question is obnoxious to many. It should be obvious, however, that "straight teaching" is precisely what we need if we are to be right with God. This is the girdle that makes our armor fit close instead of shifting and wabbling all about us.

THE fourth piece of armor is the shield of faith. There were two kinds of shields in the olden time. One was called the aspis: a narrow disc of little value. The other was the thureos, literally "a door," which was large enough to cover the whole man. This is the shield "with which ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the adversary." Doubt and worry and anxious care are like flaming arrows that can only be quenched by such an ample or plenary faith as here referred to.

But faith in whom? If you are a Christian the answer is immediate. Our faith is not in self nor in hearsay nor in human propositions, but in a personal Christ, "in whom, though now we see him not, yet believing we rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." It is a faith that takes him at his word, accepts his promises at their face value, answers all doubts by referring them to him, leans hard on him in every trying experience, rests on his judgment as a verdict in the Court of Final Appeal, and makes its Confession of Faith on this wise, "I know whon have believed, and am persuaded that he is able keep that which I have committed unto him agai that day." One who can really make this avowal i eady to accept without demur every word of His t ching as to all truths that center in him.

THE fifth piece of armor is a pair of sandals; ' aving your feet shod with the preparation of the ospel of peace." It was the spiked sandals of a oman soldier that gave him sure footing in a cor ct at close range. In like manner the spirit of res ution which accompanies a clear view of depende e on Christ enables us "to withstand in the evil d , and having done all, to stand." This is the se et of "the perseverance of the saints." Self-confic ice is weakness; and all Christians know it. Th face the prince of darkness with confidence y in the Prince of Peace. To swerve or give y, to compromise with principle under such circum ances is to be disloyal to him.

So much for the armor: but what weap s are provided for us? One and only one: namel "the sword of the Spirit which is the Word of God.' Woe betide the Christian who, however well har ssed, is without his sword; or who has been so defle d by current mouthings against Scripture that he n onger relies upon it. Do you believe your Bible? What would you think of a man who entered batt with a wooden sword? What a fool that man wo l be! What then shall be said of a professing Christi who, having received this weapon from the Captai f his salvation, regards it as nothing but a feeble co bination of truth and falsehood and therefore no etter than a bulrush for service at close quarters?

DO you remember how Jesus used his Sv d of the Spirit when he was tempted in the lderness? Thrice over he repulsed the adversary v h the words, "It is written": and the singular thing that, in every case, his quotation was from thos very portions of Scripture which are most vigorously enied by the anti-Biblical critics of our time. It is rvellous indeed that any man should call himself a f ower of Christ and still claim to be wiser in the Sc tures than he! So far as I am concerned I dare t renounce a jot or tittle of the Book of my Maste The Sword which he wielded so effectively in t hour of his extremity bears the name of a divine A icer; and the Sword that was good enough for him good enough for me.

But how about the carapace? This was th piece of armor that protected the back. You will r find it in the armory of God. This is because ther s no retreat and "no discharge in this war." A piper captured at Waterloo was asked by Napol n to play a pibroch, and he played it: then to play a rch, and he did so; then a retreat. "I cannot," the answer, "I never learned it." Our service nder Christ is no experiment; we begin by burni our boats behind us.

AND now what shall we say? Are we thus anoplied cap-a-pie for the conflict of life? H e we put on the helmet, the breastplate, the gird the shield and the sandals? Have we taken a fir hold on the Sword of the Spirit which is the Word o God? No man ever fails who is prepared in this ma r to meet whatever of duty or trial may await him, The armor with which King Saul would have ir sted David was "vilely cast away" on Mount boa: but the armor that Paul commended to Timot was of such service to himself that, at the close of h busy career, he could say: "I have fought the goo ght. I have finished my course, I have kept the aith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown whi the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me in that ay."

Arm us, thy soldiers, mighty Lord,
With shield of faith and Spirit's sword!
Forth to the battle may we go,
And boldly fight against the foe
With banner of the Cross unfurled,
And by it overcome the world:
And so at last receive from thee
The palm and crown of victory.

Are you a Christian? I hear the reveille To-morrow morning you will sally forth again to m the rulers of the darkness of this world. Tighte our girdle, be of good courage; the Lord will not fa ou!

The Noblest Conquest

SUNDAY, May 14. Prov. 16: 32. "He that ruleth his spirit is better than he that taketh a city." The first of all kingdoms is the kingdom of the soul. No other kingdom can be truly prosperous, if that is a scene of insurrection and discord. The resultant worth of other kingdoms is determined by the order and harmony in this. Well-regulated spirits are the first essential to the might and federacy of an empire. But the wise rulership of the spirit does not find its analogy in the crushing tyranny of the despot, but in the firm and illumined control of an orchestra. We do not rule the spirit by suppression or mutilation, but rather by a wise balancing of all powers, every faculty being permitted to exercise itself in its appointed place and order. Our control is perfected when "all that is within us"—every instrument in the orchestra—praises and blesses God's holy name. The welcome issue of all strong rulership in the spirit is not servitude but music.

The enemy who succeeds in debasing my spirit is more triumphant than if he had conquered my cities. The damage is more deadly. If his hatred for me kindles a similar hatred for him, he is terribly victorious even though I lay him in the dust. If his violence inflames my judgment, if he incites me to rashness and folly, he is winning a bigger victory than he dreams. If he goads me with the policy of "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth," he has sacked and squandered my richest treasury. But if I keep my spirit whole, if I hold it in the mood of sanity and serenity, if I preserve it from all incendiary fires, I have won my greatest victory, and other triumphs will follow in the issue.

But to rule the spirit, to keep all its powers harmonious when tempted to panic and riot, to maintain chivalry in all my warfare, to keep the holy lights burning on the most tempestuous night, these demand great resources of strength. And the need has been anticipated, and we can find our resources in Christ. "Be strengthened in the grace which is in Christ Jesus." That initial strength is not a human achievement; it is a divine equipment. It is not the creation of will, it is the gift of grace. It is an enduement, the enablement of the Holy Ghost. A man is able to rule his spirit when he himself is kept by God. J. H. J.

The Heavenly Leader

MONDAY, May 15. Joshua 5: 10-15. "As Captain of the host of the Lord am I now come." Whenever we are in great straits, we may look for a special revelation of our Lord. The moment of our extremity is ever God's opportunity. Our dark clouds are the canvas on which he loves to paint his fairest colors. Joshua's experience was limited. He knew of only two sides, his own and that of his adversaries. But the Angel-Warrior insisted that he belonged to neither the one side nor the other, but to another host, which was marshaled behind the veil, waiting for his word of command. This was the host that was to overthrow the power of the enemy, and win the land for the chosen people.

A similar vision is granted to each hardly-bested warrior. We all have our walls of Jericho. Again and again we come up against insuperable difficulties. We go out to consider our position, and cast ourselves in desperation on God. Then the angels of God meet us, then our eyes are opened to see that the mountain is full of horses and chariots of fire; then Jesus stands beside us in the fight against social wrongs, deeply-rooted evils, and the hosts of wicked spirits. All we have to do is to take our marching-orders from his lips: "What saith my Lord unto his servant?" Probably the one thing for us, as the beginning of our common campaign, is to bare our feet in reverence. F. B. M.

Greatness Through Self-Sacrifice

TUESDAY, May 16. Matt. 19: 29. "And every one that hath left houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive a hundredfold, and shall inherit eternal life." There comes in the life of every one some moment of high decision, when one must choose between something that is legitimately one's own—something he has a perfect right to possess—and which the world would not blame him for retaining—and a greater thing, which the inner voice calls duty. It is really a choice between self and the chance to serve in the greatest way possible the cause of righteousness. No one can tell another just what this choice entails or when the crisis is on; yet we are usually conscious of it, and our settlement of the question determines our greatness of spirit. Jesus calls this choice as difficult as choosing between one's own loved relatives and the going out alone to follow an unpopular cause.

The Master says, furthermore, that when a man really surrenders voluntarily some personal pleasure or comfort for a higher, unselfish ideal, the soul of the happiness that he left behind again awakens within him in the region of a larger life. He has saved his life by losing it; what he gave he keeps on a higher range of his being; the reward returns to him enriched a hundredfold.

In Tennyson's story of Enoch Arden, an old man after years of wandering and loneliness returns to his home at last, to find his family given to another. He had the right to go in and claim his own, but a larger right stirs in his bosom, and slowly he turns away to his solitary life, rather than mar a happiness for his own comfort. It was then that the poet speaks of Enoch thus:

> He was not all unhappy. His resolve
> Upbore him, and firm faith, and evermore
> Prayer from a living source within the will,
> And beating up through all the bitter world,
> Like fountains of sweet water in the sea,
> Kept him a living soul.

The Spirit of God Gives Power

WEDNESDAY, May 17. I Sam. 16: 1-13. "The Spirit of the Lord came mightily on David from that day forward." From his earliest years David had been the subject of his quickening and renewing work; but he had never experienced, before that day, the special unction of the Holy One symbolized in the anointing oil. This is specially reminiscent of our Lord. He was born of the Spirit, but his anointing did not take place till he had attained the age of thirty, and stood on the threshold of his public work. Beneath the urge of the Divine Spirit, he came to the waters of John's baptism, emerging from which, lo, the heavens were opened to him and John, though to no other, and they beheld the Spirit descending, as a dove might, and resting upon him.

It was to this that he referred in that sermon at Nazareth when he accounted for the marvelous power that had come on him since he had worshiped in those lowly seats, by saying, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, and he hath anointed me."

The same experience has passed from the Lord to his church. The apostles were certainly regenerate before the day of Pentecost; but they had to wait for ten days within closed doors until they were endued with the same power for their work in the world. Full often we have met with persons who, though unmistakably children of God, had no special power for witness-bearing, no freedom in speech, no ability to grapple with men's consciences. The Spirit of God was in, but not upon them. We have seen these suddenly awake and claim the divine anointing; and they have begun to speak with eloquence, so that men could not withstand their appeals. What our Lord needed and waited for, we also need and should seek until we find. F. B. M.

Pride and Its Punishment

THURSDAY, May 18. Prov. 29 : 23. "A man's pride shall bring him low; but he that is of a lowly spirit shall obtain honor." Pride is reckoned in the Bible as one of the deadly sins. It is a thing we are told that God hates; it goeth before a fall. "He that exalteth himself shall be humbled," said Jesus. A proud man is likened to a self-righteous Pharisee, thanking God in a self-confident prayer that he is "not like the rest of men, or even as this publican."

Pride is deadly because it is so subtle, so hard to detect, so often mixed up with virtuous tendencies. We say a man is too proud to do a mean thing, or proud of his family, or of his country; and the idea is not an evil one. Pride becomes dangerous when it hardens into a self-centered attitude. It has been defined as "a hard and confident belief in oneself, which leads one to take success as a sort of natural right, and further, makes one despise and judge hardly the performances and aims of other people."

Christians need to guard against the spiritual pride that is not considerate of another's weakness, or which would make us religious in our own particular way. Of such Jesus said that many that are first shall be last when God, who judgeth the heart, decides for or against us. Pride is likely to cover our own failures and shortcomings and bring into bold relief those of our neighbors. Love seeketh not her own; pride always seeks her own. The greatest men are said to be the most humble, since they see how vast are the heights yet to be gained, and how far we all are from reaching the supreme elevations.

Sooner or later, if we are to grow at all, we must part company with our self-inportance and get the childlike attitude that can learn of those who do not think and act exactly as we do, growing big and generous in our sympathies and regarding the work of others as important as our own. If we refuse to do this, experience will chasten us and teach us that we are not so important as perhaps we thought. Our pride will "bring us low." C. S. C.

Wonderful Love

FRIDAY, May 19. I Sam. 17: 55 to 18: 5. "Jonathan loved him as his own soul." In heaven's vault are binary stars, each probably a sun, with its attendant train of worlds, revolving round a common center, but blending their rays. So do twin souls find the center of their orbit in each other, and there is nothing in the annals of human affection more beautiful than that of two pure, high-minded, and noble men, whose love passes that of women. Such love has made the names of Damon and Pythias proverbial. It has enriched the literature of modern days in the love of a Hallam and a Tennyson. But nowhere is it more fragrant than on the pages which record the love of Jonathan and David. On the night of Goliath's overthrow a royal messenger may have hastily summoned the young shepherd to Jonathan's tent, on entering which he was amazed to be greeted with the embrace of brotherly affection. The boy-soldier must have shrunk back as unworthy, and ruefully looked at his poor apparel. But all such considerations were swept away before the impetuous rush of Jonathan's affection, as he stripped himself of robe and apparel, of sword and bow and girdle, and gave them all to David.

As we read this old-world story, we are reminded of something still more wonderful: that the Son of God has conceived for each of us "a love passing the love of women." This has been the theme of endless amazement to all the saints. Successive generations have exclaimed: "Behold, what manner of love! . . ." "He loved me, he gave himself for me."

It was the vision of that love which transformed Francis of Assisi: "From that hour his heart was wounded and melted." Think also of Thomas Aquinas: "Thou hast written well of Me. What recompense dost thou desire?" "None other than thyself, Lord." Yes, Jesus loves us better than himself, and has stripped himself of his robe, even to his girdle, on our behalf. F. B. M.

The Songs of the Joyful Heart

SATURDAY, May 20. Isa. 12: 5. "Sing unto the Lord, for he hath done excellent things; this is known in all the earth." Isaiah's mouth was full of the music of thanksgiving when he cried out, "O Lord, I will praise thee, for thou comfortedst me and madest me with joy to draw water out of the wells of salvation." Earthly words may die; human language has its cemetery; but music is eternal as God. The old garments of thought may be laid aside for newer expressions, but the melody that wings them to the skies is ever the same. Where prose fails, holy songs, like birds of Paradise, rise to the heavenly country. The larger the outpouring of praise, the more beautiful the climate of the soul, enraptured with the reflex flow of sacred song. Music makes a heaven on earth to go to heaven in. The look up and lift up of sacred melody is the only way to dwell in heaven before death opens the door. As Moses sang for joy when he smote the rock in Horeb for water, so we draw the waters of life out of the fountains of blessedness. Salvation and joyful praises are wedded together in the heart and expressed with songs of gladness.

Drawing the living water is coming to Christ, that we may sing, "I will joy in the God of my salvation." Sinful pleasures are like Marahs, bitter water, never quenching the soul thirst. "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me and drink; and the water I shall give him will be in him a well of water, springing up into everlasting life." E. W. C.

Travel on Armed Merchantmen

SECRETARY LANSING'S memorandum of April 26, which relates to the rights of armed merchant vessels, has doubtless been transmitted to Berlin, where it will probably simplify Germany's understanding of the American position. Issued in the interval between the sending of the American note of April 18 and the reception of the German reply, it may be regarded as a modification of the note itself, especially with reference to the status of merchant ships. There are certain passages in this latest memorandum which are specially important to traveling Americans. We quote the closing paragraph:

> (13) A vessel engaged intermittently in commerce and under a commission or orders of its government imposing a penalty, in pursuing and attacking enemy naval craft, possesses a status tainted with a hostile purpose which it cannot throw aside or assume at will. It should, therefore, be considered as an armed public vessel and receive the treatment of a warship by an enemy and by neutrals. Any person taking passage on such a vessel cannot expect immunity other than that accorded persons who are on board a warship. A private vessel, engaged in seeking enemy naval craft, without such a commission or orders from its government, stands in a relation to the enemy similar to that of a civilian who fires upon the organized military forces of a belligerent, and is entitled to no more considerate treatment.

Although Secretary Lansing's memorandum is not issued as a warning to Americans, it bears this interpretation, since it lays down a broad, general principle which touches the substantial point of the Gore and McLemore resolutions that were suddenly dropped by Congress two months ago. Our government has declined to issue such a warning, and would not permit Congress to do so. Instead, it evidently prefers to deal with individual cases as they arise, when travelers can be cautioned or passports refused, if such a course seems justified. Meanwhile, this latest declaration that persons taking passage on armed merchant ships, liable to be used as warcraft, need not expect immunity, should be quite sufficient to deter Americans from taking foolhardy risks during the remainder of the war.

Nations and the Denominations

PLANS for a great general conference of the various national church councils of the world, to be held at the conclusion of the present war, were laid at the meeting of the World Alliance of the Churches for the Promotion of International Friendship at Garden City, Long Island, on April 25. It was suggested that the conference take place in the same city at which the peace deliberations will be conducted and the peace treaty signed. Rev. Frederick Lynch, secretary of the Church Peace Society, and one of the secretaries of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, and also of the World Alliance, guaranteed to raise $200,000 to meet the expenses for the delegates to the convention. Peace committees will be organized throughout the United States to help the movement.

There had been a flurry of fear that history might repeat itself when this World Alliance met at Garden City. The organization was born at the moment when the great European war began in 1914. Delegates from twelve countries, representing thirty denominations, had met at Constance, Germany, August 1, 1914. But the sudden bursting forth of the flames of war made it necessary to cut short the conference, and on the night of August 2 it adjourned to meet a week later in London. Some of the delegates had strenuous times in making their way from the scenes of the war's outbreak to places of safety and peace. Last year the Conference was held on August 25 at Berne, Switzerland. This year's Conference occurs in the United States, the Alliance cooperating with the Commission of Peace and Arbitration of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.

If something like this had been done twenty-five or fifty years ago, the present world-war might have been prevented. The interest and affections of church people have always been too narrow. Christians have been too apt to talk about "my country," "my denomination." Even in small communities envy has too often taken the place of love and cooperation between the various communions of the church of Christ. In the larger organizations, the denominations have been tempted to contend against one another rather than to labor side by side for the winning of souls and the overthrow of evil, while almost all the denominations have a distinct geographical limit. They send missionaries to other lands, but the denomination itself belongs to a certain country. In this way loyalty to a denomination has gone hand in hand with loyalty to one's nation. And so the church has tended to emphasize national distinctions instead of adopting the international standpoint of Jesus.

A beautiful name—The World Alliance of the Churches for Friendship. No armies nor navies can stop the coming of that glad brotherhood which is to be.

A Church Membership Standard

IT is not a safe rule to estimate the active membership of a church by the list of names it carries on its roll. This is well understood generally, yet the custom of carrying a full list is an almost universal one. In most churches the actual working power is far below the nominal. An innovation in the established custom has been introduced by the progressive pastor of one of New York's leading churches, who a few weeks ago, with the assent of the active members, dropped over 1,300 names of ineffectives and absentees from the roll, being considerably more than half of the list. It may be explained, however, that all absentees were first apprised by letter of the proposed elimination, and that those responding satisfactorily were retained.

It is reasonable to demand some standard of church membership beyond a mere assent to the doctrines taught. Membership imposes duties that should not be neglected, burdens that should be shared, activities that ought to be borne in reasonable proportion. In a word, a mere nominal membership, without participation in a proper degree, should be impossible. Every Christian church should be a busy organization, alive to all the varied spiritual and other interests it represents. Church organization today must be characterized by united effort if it is to be successful. Many a devoted minister has to count among his members a heavy proportion of "donothings" who grace the services with their presence only on rare occasions, and who have little practical sympathy with the material upbuilding or spiritual development of the church. They may count in the congregation, but their heart and hand are not in the work itself unless they have the cooperative spirit and the will to help. The true test of church membership is willingness to serve.

Sir Roger Casement

NEARLY thirty years ago we spent an afternoon with a young, brown-haired member of the British consular service, who had just arrived from the Congo and was passing a few days in New York. He had a story of human interest to tell—a story of adventures up among the headwaters of the great African river and its confluents; of the fierce head-hunting tribes along the Lualaba, who ate the flesh of their enemies, which was sold in native markets like butcher meat; of stirring hunts in the big-game country where a man's life depended upon a quick eye and a straight shot from an express rifle. He told of his experiences in the rubber country and of the harrowing atrocities committed by the Belgians, whose inhuman treatment of the natives took the form of hideous mutilations. These outrages against humanity the young explorer brought to light, and the exposure, fortified by irrefutable evidence, shocked the civilized world. This young fellow, with hazel-gray eyes and a skin tanned by the African sun, was Roger Casement. Still in the twenties, he had accomplished much in a career that promised to be famous. Quiet, self-possessed and occasionally waxing enthusiastic in his descriptions of suffering, he gave the impression of culture and refinement. His heart had been deeply touched by the ease of the helpless blacks, and it was not surprising that, when he visited South America later, while still in the British service, he should have unearthed the dark tragedies of the Brazilian rubber camps. This time, however, it was not Belgium but England that he held accountable, and he did not hesitate to put the responsibility where it belonged.

Roger Casement, everywhere lauded for his humane work, was, like many other impulsive travelers in the tropics, careless of physical exposure. He became a victim, not once but several times, of the sun, and no man ever comes out of such an experience quite the same. He aged prematurely, grew moody and morose, and was changed in many respects. Sir Conan Doyle and others who are familiar with the story of his strange life are convinced that he has been mentally unbalanced for years past. They believe that this furnishes the key to his recent adventure in attempting to lead a revolution for Irish freedom. Brave to recklessness, he must have been c ply moved by the appeal of his native land, and t is little wonder that it should have caught him anc eld him fast; he was ready to throw his life away t win a place in history by the side of Emmet, Wolfe ne, and Parnell. It may be that the peculiar ci umstances of his case will appeal to British sym thy and that his life will be spared. These ar not martyr days, and to make a martyr in such a ase would not only be a miscarriage of justice, but ght prove a grave political blunder.

The International Labor Moveme t

MAY DAY, for centuries a time for the f ive romping of young men and maidens and ttle children, has in more recent years co to be set apart by many groups of laborers throu out the world as "International Labor Day." May Day of 1916 beholds many spectacular occurrence and situations in the world-wide labor movement. bor organizations on the continent of Europe gav way before the pressure of nationalism and patr ism and threw themselves with amazing unanimit nto the war. In Great Britain since the war bega the labor unions have from time to time cause the government considerable alarm, but they seen now to have surrendered to the demands of war. I oes not appear that the revolt in Ireland has any ect connection with the labor movement. In M ico Carranza is the avowed champion of labor, and oof of his ability to govern Mexico will be hailed the laboring class everywhere as a triumph for the vement. Japan is said to be honeycombed wit the spirit of working-class revolt. Indeed, this f is sometimes brought forward as an argument a nst the likelihood of her attempting to make war the United States. It is said that the government uld not be sure of the consolidated loyalty of its ple in the event of war.

In the United States May Day of 1916 sh s a complex, tense situation. The American Fede ion of Labor is supporting a measure in Congr to restrict immigration, thereby aligning itself a nst the International Labor Movement. Califor is bristling again about the influx of laborers fro the Orient. In Pittsburg an army of one hundre and twenty thousand workers are out on strike. One hundred and seventy-five thousand anthracit coal miners were ready to be called on strike in ca the operators did not yield to their demands. A fev ays previous a furious strike at Hastings, N. Y., lled forth several companes of state militia.

The present war in Europe is demonstrating gain that the struggle for trade and for profits the fundamental cause of war. It is demonstrating gain that the real interests of the laboring class ar ontrary to the interests of those who provoke an promote war. Altogether, the International Labo Day for 1916, while it reveals a chaotic condition the ranks of the workers, shows a world-wide sit ion which on the whole gives them good ground fo ope rather than discouragement. The very existe of the system which has blocked their progr is threatened by the world war and the world bts which will grow out of it. And though many w kers themselves fail to recognize the value of the ntiment of internationalism, that sentiment is st dily growing. The Christian Church, lovers of ace, lovers of righteousness and justice, most ac ate and profound students of sociological cond ons, wish the workers well.

Comment by the Way

WITHIN one week, over 60,000 telegrams were r ived by members of both houses of Congress pro ting against a break with Germany. This extensive peace ovement bore every evidence of being a well-planned propa nda, yet, coming direct from citizens of all classes, as it did, i one of the most remarkable developments of the present i rnational crisis.

OUR contemporary the New York Tribune is havin bad time. It wants war, war with Germany prefer , of course, but W-A-R and nothing less. Its ferocious ed rials are penned by a man-eater who lashes himself into a fur very time he sits down to write the daily leader. He is only raid that Germany won't fight, but will keep on sidesteppin He bitterly regrets that the President cannot make war; can only go on industriously writing notes. Neither can the ited States make war—all of our army being busy in Mexi and our navy being unprepared and obsolete. So, there eing no possibility of war, we can safely make believe we at it anyway. We trust the Tribune keeps its brilliant bu ozer safely chained and cooped up, else he might break loo and make war single-handed. Removal to a "dry" state, th a roomy sanitarium convenient, often proves effective such cases. We gladly offer the suggestion, being moved to so by motives of humanity.

Pictures Brought Pardon

A DECORATOR was sent to the county jail in San Francisco recently for passing bogus checks. The chapel in which the priso rs held service was barren and forb ling. He asked for the privilege of a rning the walls and ceiling in a bece ing manner. The permission was g ted and Under-Sheriff Walter McC ley bought the necessary supplies o of his own pocket. The County P le Board was holding its meeti in Sheriff Finn's office in the n county jail just as Farrell was a lying the last few strokes to his ta, and when the last application fo parole was heard he had compled his work. "I have one more a lication for you, gentlemen," sa McCauley as the board memb were preparing to leave. He th led them to the newly decora d chapel, and in place of the da and gloomy room that had se ed for the prisoners' place of w ship they found a beautifully d orated apartment done in soft, h nonious colors, with quotations fr the Bible and sacred pictures. M 'auley then made known the id tity of the decorator, and the b d voted unanimously to release F rell. The genius of the artist, hi ondness for the beautiful, and hi ability to reproduce it in colors w rounted, as it were, an atonem t for his crime, and he was rew led with pardon. Divine pard is not granted for any genius th is possessed, or any meritorious se ice rendered; only through the at ement of Christ, and repenta and return to God through hi The prophet thus expresses th hought: "Let the wicked forsake hi way, and the unrighteous man his th ghts; and let him return unto the L d, and he will have mercy upon hi and to our God, for he will a dantly pardon." (Isa. 55 : 7.)

P ce of Bibles Advancing

THE war has advanced the price of Bibles. Statements issued b religious publication societies sh that the expense of publishing pr er books, hymnals and other re ious books is so much larger th heretofore, that buyers have be compelled to pay nearly do le the price of last year. This is e mainly to the advance in the co of paper, ink, leather and glue. T American Bible Society ann ces that the stock of Bibles in E pean languages imported from G many prior to the war is now a roaching exhaustion, and the so ty does not know when it ca be replenished. The Method t Book Concern says its bills fo white paper will increase for this ye $130,000, and the cost of other m erials $20,000. There is no money co ideration, however high, that can fo a moment measure the spiritual va e of the truth contained in God's h Word. With reference to it, the w man's words can be applied: "For th merchandise of it is better than the m chandise of silver, and the gain thereof th fine gold." (Prov. 3 : 14.)

Reformed Gambler Dead

J HN PHILIP QUINN, reformed gambler, known in America and E ope as well, was found dead from h t failure in his little room on Arch St et, Philadelphia, the other day. He w known from coast to coast back in th eighties as the most expert faro d er and dice shaker in the world. The little old gray-haired gambler became honest after having swindled the public mercilessly for twenty years. At the age of sixty he was sentenced to the penitentiary for three years. While there his boy died. His wife sent to the father in prison the boy's shoe, at the sight of which he fell to the floor of his cell unconscious. The next day, it is said, it was found that his hair had turned gray in a night with grief, and he began cursing God, and then broke into loud wails of penitence and prayer to Christ for divine forgiveness and comfort, and promised God out of a converted heart that he would not only not gamble again, but would spend the rest of his life warning his fellows against the damage and ruin of that vice. He made good his pledge. He lectured in all parts of this country and in Europe, illustrating, by the gambling devices he took with him, how the gambler's bank cheated and always got the game, and he urged his hearers to avoid the vice as they would a deadly serpent. He even wrote a moving-picture scenario to extend his influence. Over his grave a tombstone will be erected by the father of a boy Quinn plucked as a brand from the burning. Quinn in his addresses insisted that the only hope of successful reform from gambling or any other vice was in having a heart made clean with the blood of Jesus Christ He was himself an illustration of this great truth: "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." (Isa. 1 : 18.)

Forward! The Garden Brigade!

EXPERIMENTAL gardening for school children in different communities is a splendid custom. The other day the boys of New York City with spades and forks at right shoulder, and with a banner reading "Forward! the Garden Brigade!" marched to the West Side Gardens in Chelsea Park to begin their annual gardening competitions. What a beautiful picture!—the children planting the seeds, those miracles of plant life, in the soil, where they will break their shells and feed on earth and air and come up to fill the gardens, fields, orchards and groves with flowers and harvests! What parables the festival of seed-planting teaches! Childhood itself is the springtime of life the time for scattering the seeds of truth, honor and love in the mind and heart. Childhood is God's garden of exquisite flowers of delicious fragrance; modest blue violets, pure white lilies. Childhood is the time when seed must be sown if there would be a harvest, and good seed sown if a good harvest is expected. How happy Satan is to get into this garden of God and scatter the tares of evil thought companionship and habit, to blight the flowers and kill the harvest; and how diligent and consecrated the seed-sowers must be to insure the harvest. The seed-planting of the children is the picture of this life, which is the scene of continuous spiritual agriculture. Not only parents, teachers, preachers, moralists, reformers, but people of every calling and condition of life, are plowing, harrowing, sowing, cultivating crops or gathering in harvests every day and week in the year. The seeds planted produce their own kind. Those who sow intelligence will reap intelligence, who sow industry will reap industry, who sow honesty will reap honesty, who sow benevolence will reap benevolence, who sow love to God will reap love to God. "God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." The most stupendous fact in spiritual husbandry is that we sow seeds here that are to produce an immortal harvest, that shall go on reproducing themselves in an unspeakable measure after we are gone, and in perfect fruitage shall appear in the gardens, and fields, and orchards of the next life. There is this description of the spiritual seed sower: "He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him." (Ps 126 : 6.)

Boy Organist

A CHURCH in Centralia, Kan., has a prodigy in the person of Edward Everett, organist, who is only thirteen years of age. When he enters the choir gallery on Sunday mornings clad in his knee-pants suit, strangers might think he was going to pump the church organ or sing in a children's chorus. When he gets on the bench at the organ the top of his head cannot be seen, so the music gives the impression of coming from the organ without any human agency. He plays voluntaries, anthems, and solo selections as well as hymns, and handles difficult music with the skill of an expert. The organ was used as an instrument of music in the worship of the Hebrews. The psalmist sounds this call: "Praise him with stringed instruments and organs." (Ps. 150 : 4.)

At Ninety Shoes Horse

JAMES COLLINS of Parnell, Mo., with happy relatives surrounding him, celebrated his ninetieth birthday. He had said for many years that if he ever lived to be ninety he would mark that event by going over to his old shop and shoeing a horse. He declared that however mean or ugly the animal might be, horse, mule or mustang, he would face the job. Sure enough, he put on his old working suit, which had been preserved as a relic, and went over to the old shop, just as a farmer led his horse in to be shod. The old man showed the vigor of youth and did the work in good time and did it well. It is invigorating to see the many women of threescore and ten or fourscore, or more, who can cook and sew and keep house and tend the flowers like a young person, and to see the old men with physical and mental powers preserved, who either go to a daily task or "tinker around" with a hammer or saw or ax, or work in the garden keeping company with the past and with those who have been translated, while they raise food for the living present. ' Mr. Collins' vigor at ninety is more than matched by this record of an active old man: "And Moses was a hundred and twenty years old when he died; his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated." (Deut. 34 : 7.)

Woman Sheriff's Heroism

MISS CONSTANCE KOPP, a girl deputy sheriff of Bergen County, New Jersey, was conducting Tony Hojnacka from the jail to the insane asylum when he tore away from her and plunged into the Hackensack River. Quick as a flash she dived into the icy waters of the river, rescued her charge and placed him in the safe care of the asylum. Hojnacka, who was pretty nearly drowned, was revived by physicians. Miss Kopp was put to bed in charge of a nurse, but went out a few hours later and attended to her duties as though nothing heroic had happened. She is made of good metal, and her heroism justifies her responsible position. As a rule, the home duties and the more feminine lines of employment are the more becoming to women. But all through secular and sacred history have appeared times when God called women to the rulership of a nation, the arena of statesmanship, or even the field of war. Miriam the prophetess was one of them of whom it is said: "And Miriam answered them, Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." (Ex. 15 : 21.)

Nine Billions in Banks

THE American Bankers' Association has made the following suggestive tabulation, indicating that the people's savings amount to nearly $9,000,000,000:

	No. of Depositors	Amounts Deposited.
630 Mutual savings banks.	8,307,787	$3,950,666,362
1,529 Stock savings banks	2,380,406	754,443,330
7,525 National banks . . .	3,000,00	871,634,485
1,498 State banks .	3,300,000	599,854,911
1,664 Loan and trust comp's	3,500,000	1,053,969,572
1,630 Private banks . .	100,000	18,002,555
1,925 School savings banks	398,540	1,792,640
12,000 Postal savings banks.	528,414	65,684,708
6,616 Buildings and loans. . .	3,103,935	1,357,707,901
34,423 depositories . .	24,619,172	$8,673,846,464

The Chicago News makes this comment on the tabulation: "These are the savings deposits of our people. They form the biggest reservoir of capital we can draw upon for the building of railroads, the extension of manufacturing industry, the financing of our cities and states." Christ in the parable taught the great truth that our possessions are given for employment and not idleness: "Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers." (Matt. 25 : 27.)

A Voice in the Wilderness

By GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL LUTZ

CHAPTER XXVII

GARDLEY sat in his little new office on the Rogers ranch and stared hard at the adobe wall opposite his desk. In some ways that fortune would be a great thing. He could do such wonderful things for Margaret! They could work out their dreams together for the people they loved. He could see the shadows of those things now—a beautiful home for Margaret out on the trail she loved, where wildness and beauty and the mountain she called hers were not far away; horses in plenty and a luxurious car when they wanted to take a trip; journeys East as often as they wished: some of the ideal appliances for the school that Margaret loved; a church for the missionary, and convenient halls where he could speak at his outlying districts; a trip to the city for Mom Wallis, where she might see a real picture gallery, her one expressed desire this side of heaven, now that she had taken to reading Browning and had had some of it explained to her. These and many other things hung in the dream-shadows before Gardley's eyes as he sat at his desk with that bit of yellow paper in his hand that had brought the news.

And then on the other hand there was all that that money represented in the past! Those dreams came for a moment and obscured the others. Reckless days and nights of folly when he was a boy and a young man at college; ruthless waste of time and money and youth; shriveling of soul till Margaret came, and found, and rescued him! And now here he was with a good position, earning money enough to marry soon, and be comfortable; happy in a sense that he was a man, doing a man's work in the world. With all that money there was no need for him to work and earn more. He could live idly all his days just having a good time—of course, making others happy too, but still, he thought, missing the exhilarating feeling that he was supplying his own and Margaret's necessities by the labor of hand and brain. The little telegram in his hand seemed somehow to be snatching from him all this material prosperity that was the symbol of that spiritual regeneration which had become so dear to him.

He put his head down on his clasped hands upon the desk then and prayed. Perhaps it was the first great prayer of his life.

"O God, let me be strong enough to stand this that has come upon me. Help me to be a man in spite of money! Don't let me lose my manhood and my right to work. Help me to use the money in the right way and not to dwarf myself, nor spoil our lives with it." It was a great prayer for a man such as Gardley had been, and the answer came swiftly in his conviction.

He lifted up his head with purpose in his expression, and folding the telegram put it safely back into his pocket. He would not tell Margaret of it—not just yet. He would think it out—just the right way. He had accepted the position with Rogers for a year and it was his business to fulfil the contract. Meantime this money would perhaps make possible his marriage with Margaret sooner than he had hoped.

Five minutes later Rogers telephoned to the office.

"I've decided to take that shipment of cattle and try the new stock provided you will go out and look at them and see that everything is all O.K. You wouldn't need to go for a couple of weeks. I've just had a letter from my man and he says he won't be ready sooner. Say, why don't you and Miss Earle get married and make this a wedding trip? Her school will be out by that time, and she could go to the Pacific coast with you. It would be a nice trip. Then I could spare you for a month or six weeks when you got back if you wanted to take her East for a little visit."

WHY not? Gardley stumbled out his thanks and hung up the receiver, his face full of the light of a great joy. How were the blessings pouring down upon his head these days! Was it a sign that God was pleased with his action in making good what he could where he had failed?

Gardley went to Margaret that very afternoon, and waited impatiently while she drilled and redrilled her speakers for commencement. Then when they were alone he put the matter before her.

He had had some money left him from his uncle, which would make it possible for him to marry at once and keep her comfortably now. He was to be sent to California on a business trip. Would she be married and go with him?

Margaret studied the telegram in wonder. She had never asked Gardley much about his circumstances. The telegram merely stated that his uncle's estate was left to him. An estate might be a few hundred dollars, enough to furnish a plain little home to her simple mind; and her face lighted with joy over it. She asked no questions and Gardley said no more about the mo y. He had forgotten that question in he greater possibility of joy.

Would she be married in ten ys and go with him?

Her eyes met his with an answ ng joy, and yet he could see that there as a trouble hiding somewh re. He presently saw what it was wit ut needing to be told. Her father nd mother! Of course, they woul be disappointed. They would want h to be married at home!

"But Rogers said we could go nd visit them for several weeks on ur return," he said, and Margaret's ce lighted up.

"Oh, that would be beautiful,' he said wistfully, "and perhaps they n't mind so much—though I always expected father would marry me if I as ever married. Still if we can go ne so soon and for so long—and Mr. Brownleigh would be next bes of course."

"But of course your father ust marry you," said Gardley, deter inedly. "Perhaps we could persuade im to come, and your mother too."

"Oh, no, they couldn't possi ," said Margaret quickly, a shad of sadness in her eyes. "You kno it costs a lot to come out here, and ministers are never rich."

It was then that Gardley's es lighted with joy. His money could ke this bugbear away at least. How er, he said nothing about the money.

"Suppose we write to your f her and mother and put the matter b ore them. See what they say. We'll nd the letters tonight. You write our mother and I'll write your father.'

Margaret agreed and went to er sk to write her letter while Gardley t down in the front seat and wrote his, atching away contentedly with his ntain pen and looking furtively now d then toward the bowed head over the desk.

Gardley did not read his letter to argaret. She wondered a little at this, t did not ask, and the letters were iled with special delivery stamps on em and Gardley awaited their replies th great impatience.

E filled in the days of waiting with business. There were letters to ite connected with his fortune, and ere were arrangements to be made his trip; besides, there were many ngs he could do to help Margaret for r coming commencement. But the ng that occupied the most of his time d thought was the purchase and itting of a roomy old ranch house in charming location, not more than ee miles from Ashland on the road to camp.

It had been vacant for a couple of ars past, the owner having gone road permanently, and the place hav- g been offered for sale. Margaret had en admired it in her trips to and from e camp, and Gardley thought of it once when it became possible for him think of purchasing a home in the est.

He bought it and set to work putting n order.

There was a great stone fireplace; d the beams of the ceilings and pillars the porch and wide hospitable rooms re of tree trunks with the bark still them. With a little work it could be de roughly but artistically habitable. rdley had it cleaned up, not disturb- the tangle of vines and shrubbery t had had their way since the last ner had left them, and which made a fect screen from the road for the ise.

Behind this screen the men worked — st of them the men from the bunk use, whom Gardley had taken into confidence.

The floors were carefully scrubbed ler the direction of Mom Wallis, l the windows made shining. Then men spent a day bringing great ds of tree boughs and filling the place h green fragrance, until the big ng-room looked like a woodland ver. Gardley made a raid upon some lian friends of his and came back with eral fine Navajo rugs and blankets, ich he spread about the room lux- ously, on the floor and over the rude ches which the men constructed. ey piled the fireplace with big logs, l Gardley took over some of his own sonal possessions to give the place a ble look. Then he stood back isfied. The place was fit to bring his de and her friends to. Not that it s as it should be. That would be for rgaret to do, but it would serve at st as a temporary stopping-place. tender light grew in his eyes as he ked it over in the dying light of the ernoon. And then he went out and e to the telegraph office, where he s sure he should find the messages m the East. His letter to Mr. Earle l contained the request for a reply telegram. His answer read:

'Congratulations. Will come as you ire. We await your advice. Have tten. Father."

e hurried to Margaret with hers, l together they read:

'Dear child! So glad for you. Of rse you will go. I am sending you ne things. Don't take a thought for We shall look forward to your visit. r love to you both. Mother."

Margaret, folded in her lover's arms, ed out her sorrow and her joy and ed up her face with happiness. Then rdley thought of the surprise he had store for her and laid his face against s to hide the tell-tale smile in his es.

For in his letter to his future father- aw he had written of his newly erited fortune, and he not only losed a check for a good sum to cover extra expense of the journey, but l said that a private car would be their disposal for the journey there l back, not only for himself but any of Margaret's friends and tives whom they might choose to ite.

THE morning after the telegram arrived Gardley spent several hours writing telegrams and receiving them from a big department store in the nearest great city, and before noon a big shipment of goods was on its way to Ashland: Beds, bureaus, washstands, chairs, tables, dishes, kitchen utensils, and all kinds of bedding, even to sheets and pillow-cases, which he had ordered with lavish hand. After all, he must furnish the house himself and let Margaret weed it out or give it away afterward if she did not like it. He was going to have a house party and he must be ready. When all was done and he was just about to mount his horse again he turned back and sent another message ordering a piano.

The next thing to be ordered was an easy carriage to convey Mother Earle and her friends from the train to the house.

The days went by rapidly enough, and Margaret was so busy that she had little time to wonder and worry why her mother did not write her the long loving motherly good-by letter to her little girlhood that she had expected to get. Not until three days before the wedding did it come over her that she had had but three brief scrappy letters from her mother, and they not a whole page apiece. What could be the matter with mother? She was almost on the point of panic when Gardley came, and for answer he bundled her onto her horse and took her riding.

Strangely enough he directed their way through Ashland and down to the station, and it was just about the time of the arrival of the evening train.

Gardley excused himself for a moment, saying something about an errand, and went into the station. Margaret sat on her horse watching the oncoming train, the great connecting link between East and West, and wondered if it would bring a letter from mother.

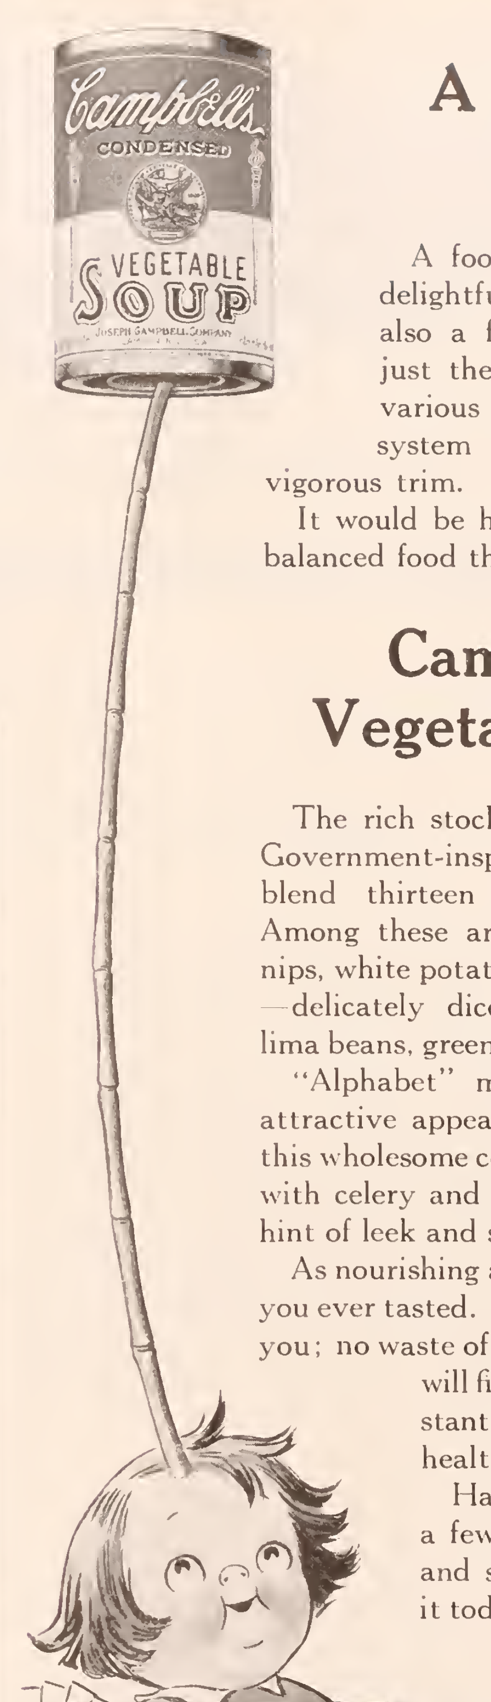
The train rushed to a halt, and behold some passengers were alighting from a private car! Margaret watched them idly, thinking more about an expected letter than about the people. Then suddenly she awoke to the fact that Gardley was greeting them. Who could they be?

There were five of them, and one of them looked like Jane! Dear Jane! She had forgotten to write her about this hurried wedding. How different it all was going to be from what she and Jane had planned for each other in their dear old school-day dreams! And that young man that Gardley was shaking hands with now looked like cousin Dick! She hadn't seen him for three years, but he must look like that now. And the younger girl beside him might be cousin Emily! But oh! who was that! It was father! And mother!

MARGARET sprang from her horse with a bound and rushed to her mother's arms. The interested passengers craned their necks and looked their fill with smiles of appreciation as the train took up its way again, having dropped the private car on the side track.

Dick and Emily rode the ponies to the house while Margaret nestled in the back seat of the carriage between her father and mother and Jane got acquainted with Gardley in the front seat. Margaret never even noticed where they were going until the carriage turned in and stopped before the door of the new house, and Mrs. Tanner, furtively casting behind her the checked apron she had worn, came out to shake hands with the company and tell them supper was all ready, before she went back to her deserted boarding-house. Even Bud was going to stay at the new house that night, in some cooked-up capacity or other, and all the men from the bunk house were hiding out among the trees to see Margaret's father and mother and shake hands if the opportunity offered.

The wonder and delight of Margaret when she saw the house inside and knew that it was hers, the tears she shed and smiles that grew almost into hysterics are all past describing. Margaret was too happy to think. She rushed from one room to another. She hugged her mother and linked her arm in her father's for a walk across the long



A Balanced Ration

A food which is first of all delightfully appetizing. And also a food that combines in just the right proportions the various elements which your system needs to keep you in vigorous trim.

It would be hard to name a better-balanced food than

Campbell's Vegetable Soup

The rich stock is made from choice Government-inspected beef. In this we blend thirteen different vegetables. Among these are carrots, yellow turnips, white potatoes and sweet potatoes —delicately diced,—small peas, baby lima beans, green okra, and tender corn.

"Alphabet" macaroni adds to the attractive appearance. And we flavor this wholesome combination temptingly with celery and parsley and a delicate hint of leek and sweet red peppers.

As nourishing and satisfying a dish as you ever tasted. It involves no labor for you; no waste of time nor fuel. And you will find its regular use a constant benefit to your family's health and condition.

When it Rains on Washday Morning

"Oh dear me," says Mrs. Fluster, "how I hate a rainy washday. This will put me back all week. And it's so provoking to have it rain till ten and then clear off too late to start the washing. Unless I start at five o'clock on washday morning, I don't get through in time."

"Gracious me," says Mrs. Brightly, "why I'm going right in now and put my clothes to soak for half an hour with Fels-Naptha Soap. I'll have them all on the line by early afternoon even though it is after ten now. And my wash is as big as yours.

"The trouble with you is," continues Mrs. Brightly, "you do the hard work. I don't. I use Fels-Naptha Soap and let it work for me. You wear yourself and the clothes out with hard rubbing, and I get mine just as clean, in half the time, with less than half the work."

"Well, if you've got an extra cake of that soap handy," says Mrs. Fluster, "I'll take it from you and let it do my wash today. You say full directions are on the Red and Green wrapper? And you use it for all kinds of soap-and-water work, as well as washing clothes?"

Yes, wise women use Fels-Naptha Soap for washing and all their soap-and-water housework, because it really saves them much hard work, and cuts the time in half. Fels-Naptha is the perfect combination of soap with that wonderful cleanser—naptha. It not only cleans and purifies the surface of things but searches out the hidden grease and dirt.

piazza, she talked to Emily and Dick and Jane; and then rushed out to find Gardley and thank him again. And all this time she could not understand how Gardley had done it, for she had not yet comprehended his fortune.

THE wedding took place in the schoolhouse, embowered in foliage and all the flowers the land afforded, decorated by the loving hands of Margaret's pupils, old and young. She was attended by the entire school marching double file before her, strewing flowers in her way. The missionary's wife played the wedding march, and the missionary assisted the bride's father with the ceremony. Her dress was a simple white muslin with a little real lace and embroidery handed down from former generations, the whole called into being by Margaret's mother. The whole neighborhood was at the wedding.

Back at the new house a wedding supper was served. All the old friends from the bunk house filed in to the great tables heavily loaded with good things, the abundant gift of the neighborhood. Afterward the entire company of favored guests stood about the piano and sang "Blest Be the Tie That Binds," with Margaret at her new piano.

Then there was a little hurry at the last, Margaret getting into the pretty traveling dress and hat her mother had brought, and kissing her mother good-by, though happily not for long this time.

Mother and father and the rest of the home party were to wait until morning, and the missionary and his wife were to stay with them that night and see them to their car the next day.

So, waving and throwing kisses back to the others, they rode away to the station, Bud pridefully driving them from the front seat. As they made their way from the carriage to the trai scuttled behind with the suit then hustled off the car as the trai under way, and Margaret and Ga went out to the observation pla to wave him a last farewell.

Violets

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

I REMEMBER one May time quite long ago, when I went on my first search for violets. I made a long and diligent search, but, though the day was fair and balmy, though the sky was blue, and though I saw many green plants lifting their brave little heads above the earth, I did not see one purple gleam of a flower. So I started home, discouraged, my empty flower-basket on my arm.

My little chum had always lived in the country and knew country ways and flower secrets more completely than I. On my way home, empty-handed, I met her walking gaily down the road carrying a little wicker basket filled to overflowing with wonderful purple fragrance.

"Where did you find all of those violets?" I questioned. "I looked and I looked, and I didn't see a one!"

My little chum was thoughtful for a moment, and then with a happy chuckle she emptied half of her flowers into my basket.

"Did you look under the leaves?" she asked. "Did you? Lots of times you can't see violets by standing up an' looking down into the bed. You've got to get down on your knees and push away the dead leaves from last fall—you've got to peek under the biggest leaves an' the little green shoots and then you'll see the flowers. You see, they sort of hide. They don't grow right out in the open like—the weeds!"

THERE was once a quiet sweet-looking girl who went to my church. I used to watch her sometimes, during the service, for she seemed shy, and calm, and rather interesting. I often wondered what she did for a living, and who her friends were, and how old she was. But I never met any one who seemed to know anything about her.

"She's so quiet and retiring!" people would say. "Oh, yes, she is sweet, and I'm sure that we'd like her if we only knew her. But she keeps to herself."

The girl did keep to herself. Once in a while she would raise her eyes when one passed her on the street, and if one smiled at her she would smile back, and hurry on as if she feared that she would have to talk.

We had a club—we girls—and our leader, who was a fine, big-souled woman, opened the meeting one day with a little very personal talk.

"Young ladies," she began, "there is a girl who goes to this church—a girl your own age who seems lonely. She can't make any advances to you because she's shy—so shy that she would almost rather be lonely than speak to people. Any one as shy as that is not much fun, but I think it's your duty to ask her to belong to your club. It would make her feel more at home."

There was some grumbling among the girls, for our club was a rather select little organization, and the members were all friends of long standing. But our leader was very popular, and she had appealed to our sense of duty. The grumbling died to a low murmur, and we invited the girl to join us. We could tell that the invitation had pleased her, although her words of acceptance were stilted and bashful.

THE girl joined the club. We found out that her name was Beatrice Ames, and that she worked in a magazine office. She volunteered no information, and we grew tired of asking questions. She still interested me, in a way, but the interest grew vague and finally drifted away. For she seemed ultra-commonplace to those who knew her as we club girls did. She attended the meetings regularly, and paid her dues, and voted on questions in a low voice that trembled with shyness. She came to our socials and sat in a corner watching us with eyes that were carefully veiled. At the end of six months we knew that her name was Beatrice Ames, and that she worked at a magazine office—and we knew no more. We were too busy with our own little affairs to find out anything else.

And then we decided that we should give a fair for the benefit of some poor children. We discussed it excitedly in meeting.

"I wish some one could get some wonderful posters," mourned our leader. "I wish some of you girls had a little talent for drawing. Attractive posters put up in good places would help our fair so very much."

And then for the first time the shy girl volunteered a suggestion. It was a startling suggestion.

"I can make posters for you," she said quietly. "How many will you need?"

Almost rudely we stared at her. For we were very much surprised. Our leader voiced the thought of the cl

"But—can you paint?" she questioned. "Isn't that lovely! Why c you tell us? Why haven't we seen of your work?"

"You have seen my work," the told us shyly, "but you did not that it was mine. I do all of the de tions for my magazine."

We all knew the magazine—m us subscribed to it. It was a big m zine, and the decorations were al the biggest part of it. With a gr respect and interest the girls o club looked at the girl who wa bashful to make friends—too bashf speak out in meeting.

THE posters of our fair were wonderful. I will always mai that folk came because they were d magnet-like, by the posters. ON October 31, 1917, it will be four hundred years since Martin Luther nailed the Ninety-five Theses upon the door of the castle church at Wittenberg, which began the Reformation. The world will celebrate that event next year.

Several of the national bodies of the Lutheran Church have joined forces and opened headquarters in the Hornor Building, Philadelphia, and preliminary preparations for an impressive and constructive celebration are well under way. For more than a year the Joint Committee has had meetings, and sub-committees are now arranging the details and giving form to the leading features.

The Meetings and Program Committee has a standard program to recommend and is advising with local committees throughout the country on time of celebration, periods and features. The plan is to distribute the celebrations through the year between October 31, 1916, and October 31, 1917. A booking agency for speakers and lecturers is established at the main office in Philadelphia.

A VERY touching letter comes from a woman in one of the Pacific Coast states, who writes, "Would you send me free the Christian Herald for a while? I have four children, all big enough to read (nine to fourteen years), and I am not able to buy good books and papers for them. We live here in the mountains, on a homestead, and can hardly get enough to eat, so you know what it means to children to have good reading matter." Such an appeal, of course, we could not overlook, so we have sent this farmer's wife the Christian Herald, which will go to her lonely mountain farm every week, and package of books for her little folks. are many such cases as this. Any reader would wish to write to this mountain family can obtain the address by sen postal to the Christian Herald.

BLACK TREAD, WITH RED SIDES

You cannot WEIGH Resilience

THIS concerns a Lost Viewpoint!

The most valuable thing in a Pneumatic Tire is that which costs least and, so, is too often least appreciated.

—To wit—the Air, which fills the Tire.

The value of Air, for Tire purposes, lies not only in its great compressibility, — its springiness,—nor in its immediate distribution of pressure all over the Tire, instead of localizing it at point of pressure.

It lies, too, in its ready conformance to the perpetually changing surface of the road.

Reduce that readiness of a pneumatic Tire to thus conform in its shape, and you reduce its Value proportionately, no matter how much you increase its cost, or its price, to Consumers.

Every unnecessary layer of Fabric put into a Tire Casing reduces the capacity of its walls to quickly conform and quickly resume shape.

—To bend freely in the traction-wave of rolling Tires, with minimum waste of Motor-power and Gasolene.

—To negotiate every pebble and every tiny rut, on the road, without transmitting Vibration from these to the Car-Occupants and to Car-Mechanism.

THE more layers of Cotton Fabric there are in a Tire Casing the stiffer it is,— the heavier, hotter and harder to drive, because harder to BEND.

The more layers the more Friction between them,—and the more Friction the more Heat, to disintegrate the Rubber adhesive between Layers.

Likewise, the more Layers the more it costs to produce the Tire, while thus LOWERING its Pneumatic quality, increasing its liability to puncture through stiffness, and reducing its Mileage through Frictional Heat and Traction-wave action.

That's Diamond Tire experience.

And, that's why Diamond Tires are built FLEXIBLE, Resilient, Conformable, and Springy,— without injurious "padding" of Carcass with surplus layers of Fabric,— or "filling" of Rubber Tread with inert "ballasting" materials,— for selling-appearance.

Because,—it is not the Diamond aim to sell Tires on mere visualized "thickness" or to value them by the pound, but to market them on their "Net-Service" to Car Owners.

Diamond Tires are, therefore, stripped of all "Adipose Tissue"—that needless Bulk and Weight which is to Tires what Obesity is to the Athlete.

DIAMOND Tires are Long-lived and Enduring.

Because, they are so Pneumatic and Resilient that they "negotiate" obstacles on the road, instead of fighting them with ponderous rigidity.

The new black "Velvet" rubber, in the Squegee Treads of 1916 Diamond Tires will be found stretchy as a rubber band,— tough and close-grained as wire,— while being CLINGY to slippery places, thus affording Traction without excessive Friction.

TEST OUT one set of these "Fair-listed," moderate priced, Diamond Tires, and see how much further your Car will travel,— per dollar invested in Tires,— how much more Luxury they give to Motoring.

Through their exceptional Resilience they put "Pep" into Car-action, while reducing Vibration to a minimum,— as you shall see.

Alaska's New Railway

CONTINUING FRANK G. CARPENTER'S ALASKA STORY

Copyright, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

I HAVE just returned from a ride along the line of Uncle Sam's railway. The new construction begins here at the mouth of Ship Creek, where ocean steamers land their supplies in the summer. Everything is in preparation for rapid work as soon as Congress passes the bill supplying the money. The work has been so pushed that by last November the engineers had done what it was supposed would require the whole winter. They have now planned the whole railway. They have made careful estimates of the cost of everything connected with it, and have constructed contour maps showing the country on the scale of one inch to the mile. They know just what they have to expect, and from now on the road can be pushed as rapidly as Congress will furnish the money.

The act providing for government railroads in Alaska was passed March 12, 1914. It authorized the operation and building of railroads here to an extent not to exceed 1,000 miles and at a cost of not more than $35,000,000. It was on this authorization that the President bought the Alaska Northern Railway and decided to extend it to Fairbanks, a distance of 472 miles, at a cost of something like $27,000,000. In 1914 the appropriations amounted to about $1,000,000. Something like $2,000,000 was appropriated last year and the engineers have asked for $10,000,000 to be spent in 1916. If that is granted the road to the Matanuska coal fields can be completed and the lower portion of the extension to Fairbanks put into operation this year. The road can also be built from the Nenana coal fields to the Fairbanks gold mines, giving that rich territory the cheap fuel it so greatly needs.

The total length of the government railway will be under 500 miles, and the engineers tell me it can be constructed at an average cost of about $50,000 per mile. In some places the cost will run to $90,000 per mile, but in others it will be $20,000 or under. The road will cost about the same as the western end of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, and it will be more expensive than the Northern Pacific or the Puget Sound division of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul. The track is to be of the standard gauge, with rails of seventy pounds to the yard. It will be substantially built and of the most modern construction.

There is no red tape here at Anchorage and so far "fuss and feathers" are absent. The three engineer commissioners tramp about with the men and go over the job on foot and on horseback. Nevertheless, William C. Edes, the chairman of the commission, has built some of the great roads of the West. Lieutenant Frederick Mears was superintendent of the railway at Panama, and Thomas Riggs, Jr., was at the time of his selection chief of the boundary survey.

The most of the clerks are doing their work in tents or log cabins, and the forestry department of the government is a two-room shack with folding cots, on which the clerks sleep at night. The commissary building is of logs, and the stables near by, where from fifty to one hundred horses are kept, are of canvas. The hotel or messroom for the men and government employees is of logs, and three meals there are given for $1 a day.

Everything is business. The work began sixteen days after the President decided the route, and it has gone on steadily as long as the money has lasted. Fifteen hundred men have been at work the past year, and something less than a thousand are now on the job.

THE construction and grading are after a system known as station work. A certain section of the road or station is given out to a number of men called a gang, who contract to build it according to the specifications. They go in together as partners, and have an equal share in the work. The cost is estimated by the cubic yard, and the pay is on that basis. The government sees that the men have fair treatment. It has timekeepers who go over the work and keep track of just what each man does, so that on the completion of the job the account shows the efficiency of every man on it. There is nothing of the peonage system connected with these arrangements. There is no one who employs all the hands and gets a rake-off. The government sees that the arrangement is on a partnership basis, and that each man gets his individual check for his share. The great advantage of this method is that it eliminates all questions as to hours and conditions of work. Uncle Sam pays for results only, and that within a fixed time.

I have asked the officials as to the wages prevailing in the other branches of the construction. Mr. Edes tells me they are higher than those paid for similar work in the western parts of the United States, although they are much below those of interior Alaska. The men here are now getting from 37½ cents an hour upward. Some of the skilled laborers are paid 50 cents an hour, and some 75. This is without board, but the latter is furnished at the government messhouse at 33⅓ cents a meal. The time is eight hours where the men work by the day, and this makes the wages range from $3 to $6. The men have the right to buy their personal supplies and other things of the government commissary, where goods are sold for their wholesale cost, plus a small percentage for handling the business. This gives them the goods at about 40 per cent. under the ordinary prices, and enables the poorest of them to clear as much as $2 per day. Medical and hospital charges are free.

So far there has been plenty of labor. The United States has a large class of professional railroad builders who move about from job to job. There are also many who prefer to work on the frontier, and it is this class that is now doing the greater part of the construction. The men are of all nationalities and the greater proportion are foreigners. In addition are a few men from Alaska. The engineers tell me it is difficult to get Americans to do the rough work. They all want to be foremen, bosses or timekeepers. They will work hard as prospectors and miners, but they will not continue for any length of time to handle the pick and the shovel at so much per day.

I wish I could show you the roadbed and track so far constructed. The new railway looks as though it might form an exhibit in a national exposition. It runs through the woods, but the land on both sides has been cleared, and ditches drain away every bit of the water. A smooth bed of gravel, ten or more feet in height, has been made through the valley of Ship Creek, and this is of the requisite width for the track.

The engineers have the advantage here of building along hills made of gravel. They are composed of pebbles ranging from the size of my fist to that of a pea, and all that has been necessary to get the material for the fills has been to drive cuts into the hills at the side of the track. These cuts are then roofed over and the cars are run into the bank and loaded by gravity.

MY trip over the new roadbed was made in company with Mr. J. E. O'Reilly, the superintendent of the railway construction. We started at the harbor and crossed the railroad yards about which the terminals are to be built. These yards have an area of 500 or 600 acres, and the ground is as flat as a floor. It was originally covered with forest, but the trees and stumps have been cleared away and now it looks like an Iowa cornfield just about that city carries gold. As much as nine million dollars' worth has already been washed out of the creeks and valleys near by, and the production last year was three and one-half million dollars. The most of this comes from placers; quartz mining is a comparatively new industry and it has produced only about $800,000.

The Alaskan mining regions will profit exceedingly by the cheap fuel that will come from the railroads. The Nenana fields are of vast extent. The railroad passes through them, and is down grade all the way from there to Fairbanks. The coal deposits run from the railroad eastward for a distance of perhaps 100 miles. The black strata can be seen standing out in the cliffs and in places the veins are forty feet thick. The coal is a high-grade lignite suitable for all local commercial purposes. It has an ash which is 46 per cent. fixed carbon, and its heat value is equal to about 12,000 British thermal units. It is not good enough to bear exportation, but it will be of enormous value to the mining regions of the interior.

In order to appreciate what this coal means to the mining regions, it must be remembered that most of the gold deposits are in frozen ground. The frost and ice go down to bed rock. The earth has been frozen for ages, and it has to be thawed out by fire or steam. A single mine will often consume from ten to twelve cords of wood a day, and so far nothing but wood could be used. Something like 100,000 cords of wood are now annually sold in the region about Fairbanks. This wood costs from $10 to $16 a cord, and the average in Fairbanks is between $11 and $12 a cord. At $15 a cord a mine will use as much as $150 worth of fuel a day, and unless the gravel or quartz is of comparatively high grade it will not pay to work it. Moreover, the wood here is soft, and it has no great heating value.

The Nenana coal, when the railroad is complete, will probably be worth at the mines about $5 per ton, and as one ton of coal is equal to two cords of wood, five tons will thaw out as much earth as ten cords of wood. In other words, the difference in cost will be the difference between $25 and $150 a day in working the mines. This alone will mean a great profit and it will result in enormous areas of low-grade gold-bearing regions being worked. It means the opening of many new quartz properties, and a great increase in the valleys and benches where the gravel can be washed over by dredging and hydraulic sluicing.

Relief for Jews in Russia

Of all the people who have suffered deeply from the present war, none have borne a greater burden than the Jews. Out of a population of thirteen million Jews in the world, fully seven millions are affected by this war. Jews are fighting each other in the armies of Europe. Russia alone has three hundred and fifty thousand Jewish soldiers. Austria has over fifty thousand; altogether there are probably one-half million Jews in the ranks of the fighting armies.

The Jews are feeling the brunt of war's burden, not only on the field of battle but also in their homes, where they have been singled out by their peculiar geographical, political and economic position. Their suffering surpasses that of all others. When the war broke out, one-half of the Jewish population of the world was trapped in the corner of Eastern Europe, which is absolutely shut off from all neutral lands and from the sea. Russian Poland, where over two million Jews live, is a salient. South of it is Galicia, a frontier province of Austria. Here are another million Jews. Behind Russian Poland are the fifteen Russian provinces which, together with Poland, constitute the Pale of Jewish Settlement. Here live another four million Jews. Thus seven million Jews—a population exceeding that of Belgium [illegible] million—have borne the brunt of the war.

In front were Germany and Austria, to the south was Rumania. Over this territory occupied by the Jews, crossed and recrossed the contending armies of Teutons and Russians. Of course, all the peoples of this area suffered from ravage and pillage; but the ones who suffered most were the Jews. Hundreds of thousands were forced from their homes on a day's notice, the more fortunate being packed and shipped as freight. The old, sick and insane, women and children, were shuttled from one province to another. Those in the cars were sidetracked for days without food or help of any kind, and many of the less fortunate found their way into woods and swamps to die of starvation. The catastrophe which has overtaken these people is unparalleled in the history.

The sympathy of the outside world has been in a large measure shut off from them. Because of their political status they have not the consolation of knowing they are fighting for their fatherland and they have no hope of a possible war indemnity.

These are the sufferings of this distressed people that friends in Britain and America desire to have known to the outside world. At the present time, hunger and disease are the lot of thousands upon thousands of Jewish men, women and children whom the war has driven from their homes. In Poland alone there are at least two hundred towns and about nine thousand villages that have suffered from the war. About three million people are destitute, and of these one million five hundred thousand are Jews. The total number of Jews who have one way or another suffered immediately from the war equal over two million people and represents one-third of the total Jewish population of Russia.

Over three hundred and fifty thousand Jews are fighting in the ranks of the Russian army. Their mothers, wives and children are receiving scanty support from the government. About one-half of them, however, are not getting any government aid at all. Their marriages, although legally solemnized, have not been entered in the official marriage records, and thus they cannot qualify for state aid.

Rent and food having become considerably dearer with the outbreak of the war, the soldiers' families have suffered acute want, and many of them become charges on the communities. Many of the soldiers will never come back from the battlefields; others will return as cripples, unfit to support themselves or their families.

TO meet in some measure the needs of this suffering people, the "Russian Jew Relief Fund" was opened in Great Britain. A large committee representative of the Christian and national spirit of the country has been organized with headquarters at 122 George Street, Edinburgh. Among the patrons of this fund are leading men, including the moderator of the Church of Scotland, the moderator of the United Free Church of Scotland, the Bishop of Edinburgh, the Rev. Pim Whyte, D. D., the Rev. John Clifford, D. D., the Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, D. D., the Rev. John Kelman, D. D., the Lord Provost of Glasgow, the Lord Provost of Aberdeen, the Lord Mayor of Manchester, the Lord Mayor of Newcastle, Sir Samuel Chisholm, Bart., and Sir A. R. Simson, M. D. A branch of the Fund has been opened on this side of the Atlantic with headquarters in Toronto. The chairman of this committee is Sir William Mortimer Clark, K. C., LL. D., Toronto. The treasurer is Thomas Findlay, 88 Admiral Road, Toronto, and an appeal is now made to the Christian public of the United States and Canada through the Christian Herald. Contributions will be remitted direct to the British committee in Edinburgh, which in turn will transmit them to the Relief Committee in Petrograd, of which Baron A. de Gunzberg is treasurer. All contributions will be acknowledged.

Too Late!

THE world runs on inexorable time schedule. Yet who can say what Time really is? We get it from the stars but where do the stars get it?

When you come to think of it, there's something awe-inspiring in having in your vest pocket a mechanism so delicate, so fine, so perfect, that it actually knows and measures Time—the power above the stars!

Do you own such a watch?

There are certain types of men who haven't much respect for Time. Time is nothing in the life of a tramp. Men of little character, wasters and dreamers rather pride themselves on their contempt of Time. Sooner or later, that ghostly, implacable hand reaches out and turns them back. You can form a fairly accurate estimate of a man's character by the quality of the watch he carries and by his pride in its accuracy.

Any watch will do for the man who is content to drift in a few minutes late, but what a gap there is between him and the man who has disciplined himself to keep track of the seconds!

A boy is satisfied with a pocket clock. As he develops in character, he demands a watch. When he finally grows to man's understanding of things he wants a super watch.

Which leads naturally and easily to a discussion of Hamilton Watches.

The Hamilton Watch is known as the Railroad Timekeeper of America. That title was honestly earned. Time is everything to a railroad man. To him, the words, "Too Late," are ominous. They mean to him failure, danger, death.

A railroad man is required to own an accurate watch. If his watch varies a certain number of seconds a month, it means buy a new watch or get a new job. A large proportion of railroad men own Hamilton Watches. That is because railroad men have learned, by comparing notes for twenty years or more, that the Hamilton of all watches comes closest to absolute accuracy—to Star Time. A carpenter is the best judge of a saw. The judgment of railroad men as a class is final when it comes to watches.

Does this reference to railroad watches make you think of Hamilton Watches as being thick, clumsy, serviceable affairs? Learn then that Hamilton accuracy is not attained through bulk. Hamilton Watches are as thin and beautiful as you could possibly desire.

But after all, a watch is not a trinket to be selected for its looks. A fine watch is a wonderful instrument and must be judged solely by its performance in the accurate measuring of Time.

Buy a Hamilton, not merely because it is beautiful, but for the deeper reason that you can depend on it for the rest of your life to tell you the accurate time —Star Time.

Or you can buy a Hamilton movement to fit your present watch case for $12.25 ($13.00 in Canada) and upward. Read "The Timekeeper"; ther give your jeweler an opportunity to tell you why a really good watch is the only kind to buy. The more your jeweler knows about watches the more enthusiastic he will be on the Hamilton.

Teach children to get a receipt

IT is often necessary to send children to the store. It is irritating when they bring back the wrong change. Usually it means a trip to the store for father or mother to straighten it out.

Have you had this experience only to find that the clerk couldn't remember the transaction? Or that he insisted it was not his error? Either you got the missing change with an apology, or the proprietor gave it back reluctantly, or he wouldn't give it back at all.

If the clerk feels he is right, he may suspect the child.

If the proprietor is convinced you are right, the clerk is open to censure.

In either case an unpleasant impression is left, and confidence destroyed.

Isa. 40:29

The world passes on its way with unconcealed contempt for the faint that fall out of the march, because too exhausted to keep up. The strong exult in their strength, and have small patience with those that have no might. The favorite motto with such is that might is right, the race is to the swift, and the devil take the hindmost. Probably Darwin did not mean all that has been read into it by his famous phrase, "The survival of the fittest"; but that phrase aptly describes the motto and method which have become the chosen passwords of great and mighty nations. How different is all this from the Gospel of love and mercy that pervades the whole Bible! The faint, the weak, those that

Paul and Barnabas, Church-Builders

By Arthur H. Howland

OUR lesson continues the narrative of Paul and Barnabas "swinging around the circle." Here is a chance for the teacher to demonstrate what a fascinating, lively thing a map can be. Your teaching will make this map seem alive, and the map, if it is handled right, will make your lesson seem alive. We have followed Paul and Barnabas on this first missionary tour: From Syrian Antioch, by ship to the isle of Cyprus, from end to end of that island, by ship again to the coast of Pisidia, on to the near-coast city, Perga, northward to Antioch in Pisidia. We saw in last week's lesson how the jealousies and strifes of the Jews in Pisidian Antioch drove them out of that city and how they came to Iconium. Today's lesson tells the story of the events in Iconium, Lystra and Derbe. These three cities lie in a rather straight line, running eastward and a little south from Pisidian Antioch. Looking at the map it appears to be a very short distance from Derbe back to Syrian Antioch, their starting-point. But aside from the fact that they wished to revisit the churches they had just established, there was the hindering fact of a big mountain range lying between Derbe and the coast toward Syrian Antioch. If they had chosen, however, to go home this way, a straight line would have taken them within a few miles of Paul's native city, Tarsus. Instead of doing this, however, they retraced their steps, going from Derbe back to Lystra, then on westward to Iconium, then to Pisidian Antioch, then southward for a brief stop in Perga, then—probably because they knew of a ship which was just about to sail from the coast town Attalia—they went there, and from that port sailed all the way back to Syrian Antioch. These three towns, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe, look very near together on the map, but the experiences Paul and Barnabas had there covered an amazing range, all the way from being hailed as gods to being half killed.

When they first reached Iconium they went into the synagogue of the Jews. They still longed to give the people of their own race an opportunity to accept the evangel of Jesus. But many Gentiles seem to have been in the congregation gathered in that Jewish synagogue. The people of the town had doubtless heard of the excitement caused by the visit and message of the missionaries at Pisidian Antioch, and had heard of their willingness to preach to the non-Jews, so there was a full church that Sabbath morning and many, both Jews and Greeks, "believed."

It would be well worth while to stop a moment for a discussion of those beautiful words "believe" and "believer," which early came to have a technical, unique meaning in Christian phraseology. There is a peculiarly fragrant and spiritual tone in the sayings and writings of those who love and use the word.

e populace were so amazed at this tha they believed Paul and Barnabas to gods, not men. Here was a case of mi rected faith, a faith that was not ba on fact and reason. Paul and Ba abas were horrified at the idolatro ideas of these misguided people, an ompelled them to stop their plans for orshiping them. They showed the tru humility of Christians. After reporting the events of hei journey to the church at Antioch, Pau and Barnabas resumed their resi en in that city, and continued there lo time, doubtless as the leaders of he ntioch church.

The Lesson for Boys

C ME, boys, here's a real hike. Along e old Roman road from Antioch o eia we will go, in imagination, with Pau nd Barnabas. It is a dusty road and e hills and fields are dry. But now and en we come to a walled garden in hi trees and grass and gardens invite s enter and rest, perhaps to swim. ut e do not stop, for we have business n I nium, now Konieh, and soon from hi top we see the first cluster of flatoof , white-walled houses of the city. e ss a merchant on a donkey leading no er donkey loaded with his goods, nd e meet a centurion with his band f s liers marching toward Antioch to er se the guard at the annual games t stadium. We fall in with other ilg ns and we enter the walled city hat ow occupies the site of ancient co m. It is hard to imagine this ma squalid town as the proud city where Paul preached and from whose persecutions he fled. We go on for more dusty miles along the highway, passing more gardens, more lonely wastes and more rolling hills and valleys, to the Turkish village of Latik, which was no mean city in Paul's day. Today the walls are fallen. The Roman theater and baths and the houses of the wealthy Lystrians, all have gone as have their owners, but their memory still lives in fragments of ancient walls that stand alone or form a part of a modern dwelling. We remember that Paul was here both worshiped and stoned, and we go on, still on, over the great central plain of Asia to Derbe on the edge of the province. But we find only a mound of decaying ruins, with here a stone and there a broken column, to mark the city where Paul taught unhindered, and from which he retraced his steps to strengthen the churches where he had been persecuted. It is said that in the days of the Yukon gold excitement thousands of men outfitted at Skagway and with their packs and dog trains started over the coast range for the gold fields. But only tens reached the goal where thousands started. Only those who, in the face of fatigue and cold and storm and difficulty, pressed on; only those who wouldn't quit got to the Yukon and had a chance to seek its gold. Paul and Barnabas wouldn't quit.

The Lesson for Girls

"AND they called Barnabas, Jupiter; and Paul, Mercurius. . . ." At times all of us, I guess, have wished that somebody would look up to us, and revere us, and fear us, almost. At times every one has had the desire to appear truly great. You girls, often, by letting folk assume things, could make a decided impression, when telling the straight-from-the-shoulder truth would entirely sweep the glamour away. If Paul and Barnabas had not been absolutely true, absolutely above the temptation of flattery, they might have been pleased when the multitude thought that they were gods. They might have been crowned with flowers, and had sacrifices offered to them. But instead of letting people assume that they were immortal, they came down into the midst of the crowd and cried: "We are men like you."

I once knew a girl who wrote very stupid letters. It was a drawback to her, and so one day, when she wanted to apply for a position, she asked a friend of hers to write her letter of application for her. The friend, who was a clever letter-writer, good-naturedly wrote the application, and the position was secured. The heads of the firm often complimented the girl on her letter, and when they did she would say nothing, and they assumed that she was more clever than she was. If she had spoken up and said, "I did not write that letter; a friend of mine wrote it," she would have been telling the truth, even though it would have hurt her. But she was not brave enough to tell the truth.

Paul and Barnabas were brave enough to tell the multitude that they were not gods, although said multitude would have listened raptly to any message from the gods. Because they admitted that they were only men, Paul was beaten by the priests, and the message of Christ was only heard by those who were brave enough to follow men who were suspected of many things.

Are you brave enough to tell your limitations to the little multitude that makes up the tissue of your social life? It sometimes takes real courage to let your schoolmates, or your Sunday school classmates, or your friends and your family know that you are not as clever or as good as they think you.

Lightens the Dairy Work

This is, perhaps your busiest season. Anything which will lighten your work receives an eager welcome. Thousands of busy farm women have found our wonderful new separator a great boon. It makes the dairy work ever so much easier. And, it gets a lot more cream than your old-style machine.

Formerly, separators had to be turned at a high and uniform speed. When the speed slackened even a little, a lot of cream would escape into the skim milk. But you can turn the handle of

THE NEW SHARPLES SUCTION-FEED

Separator fast when you feel spry and slow when you feel tired. The bowl draws in the milk as needed. That's why The New Sharples skims clean at all speeds.

Then, too, the cream is always of the exact thickness desired and smooth as velvet. A woman can easily pour heavy pails of milk into the low supply tank. Milk can never overflow at the bottom. The machine is self-oiling—no "mussy" oil drip. Still another strong point, the three-piece bowl has no discs to wash, get mixed up or become lost.

Send a postal for our free book, "Velvet" for Dairymen which fully explains this machine that lightens dairy work. Write today before you forget. Address Dept. H.

READER. Can any instructions be found in the Bible in regard to the duties of brothers and sisters? Parents are told they have duties to their children, and children are commanded to honor and obey their parents. Why, then, is not something said about duties to others who are blood kindred?

The Jewish idea of loyalty to blood kindred was very strong and continues so to the present. The word "brother" used in the Old Testament means not only "brother" as we use the word, but cousin, or uncle. Gen. 13: 8; 14: 14, 16 (Abram and Lot); 29: 15 (of Jacob and Laban). Throughout the Old Testament the duties of brother to brother or sister is emphasized. Notice especially Judah's loyalty in becoming surety for Benjamin, and Joseph's emotion at finding his brothers again, though they had so wronged him, and his special desire to see Benjamin, his full brother. Prov. 18: 24 contains the beautiful expression: "There is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother." This has often been interpreted as referring to Christ, but even if it is not so understood it clearly sets a high estimate on the relation of brother to brother, implying that it is rare to find any friend more faithful and loyal than a brother. Jesus recognized the close relationship of brother in his friendship for James and John and for Andrew and Peter. Andrew's first act upon finding Jesus was to go and tell his brother. The great message of the New Testament is that the Christian should treat all men as brothers; and this message is meaningless except as it implies that the relationship of brother to brother is sacred and intimate, and must be characterized by service and sacrifice.

Subscriber, Detroit, Mich. Why do not all the Christian organizations enter into the Lenten Meditations during Lent?

There used to be a strong opposition in some Protestant bodies to any recognition of the Lenten season, or indeed of any church days at all. Harriet Beecher Stowe, in her charming book, "Old Town Folks," describes the dread and dislike these Puritan Christians felt at the idea of celebrating Easter, and, some of them, even Christmas. The fear was that the recognition of these days as especially sacred might send the church back into formalism and ritualism. Of late years, however, this feeling has almost disappeared. We believe it has disappeared entirely so far as Christmas and Easter are concerned, but some still hold aloof from the observance of Lent. These objectors feel that the Christian should go as far as he can every day in sacrifice and service, and that if a special time is set apart for special sacrifices he will be tempted to justify indulgence at other times. But the Lenten spirit has been a great blessing to many Protestants, teaching them the beauties of spirituality, meditation and self-denying service for others.

J. C., Kingsburg, Calif., writes to ask: "How can priests or pastors talk about the war doing good by bringing about a revival of religion, unless they mean a revival of the worship of the god who delighted in human sacrifice? Today I received a heart-broken letter from a friend in Europe whose eldest boy has just been taken to train, and will go to the front in June or July. This is an extract: 'Of course, the relatives came to see them leave. It was pitiful—heart-breaking! I cried, and so did many others. Young mothers with babies in arms were bidding good-by to their husbands, and old mothers and fathers were sobbing their hearts away, but still trying to look brave, and the soldiers were trying to look like men and control themselves. But they couldn't. As the boat was starting, and as we left, I looked on the wharf and saw women fainting—not one or two, but dozens and dozens. Meantime, the boys were trying to sing "Tipperary," and as the music was low, it was broken in on by the wailing of the people on the shore. It was the most pathetic sight I ever saw, and I shall remember it to the last of my days.' I asked myself this question, after reading the letter: 'If Jesus were here, what would he say about the war?'"

O. H. P., Grapevine, Tenn. 1. The phrase, "last days," used in Gen. 49: 1, is better rendered in the Revised as "latter days." The patriarch was calling his sons not only to receive his dying blessing, but to listen to the words of counsel born of wisdom and experience. It was a forecast of the future. 2. The Liquor Question in Porto Rico

TWO well-known missionaries at arrochales, Porto Rico, have sent str g appeal through the Christian era in behalf of prohibition for that lan They write: "Can you not tell the re ders of your paper of the wretched ond on of the agricultural classes of or Rico, and of the effort now being ad o help them through the prohibi-on the liquor traffic? We must have e l p of the Christian people in the tate if we are to win in this fight.

"When Porto Rico came under the nit States flag, the people of America ere r more interested in securing free ade ith this island than in safeguard-g i people against the liquor traffic. her is no record of a single resolu-on petition being sent to Congress th time to secure the prohibition of e li tor traffic. Will the Christians of e Uited States be silent now, when a ll l come before Congress to give ohi tion to Porto Rico? Please ask our aders to use their influence; they igh be able to turn the scale.

"When Governor Yager was in the United States, he addressed the Lake Mohonk Conference and told about the wretched condition of the agricultural laborers of Porto Rico. He is reported to have said: 'This population is on the verge of starvation. If being underfed is slow starvation, there are many starving to death every year.' We have been told that $14,000,000 are spent every year in Porto Rico for intoxicating drinks and $7,000,000 for flour. Opposition will come from persons on the island who are financially interested in the liquor traffic, viz., the manufacturers of Porto Rican rum and the large dealers in it; the men on Local Government Boards who receive the money for the liquor licenses; those who sell intoxicating drinks in the small stores and the gamblers who induce the peons to drink and to bet their money. But the good people of the United States do not care anything about the arguments which will be used by these people here who are fattening on the liquor traffic."

Get A Real Trailercar While You Are At It

The Rochester Trailercar is built like an automobile.

It is not like many of the so-called trailers—simply a box on four wheels with a draw bar.

It is designed and built by experienced motor car engineers of world-wide experience who have studied the delivery and light haulage problems from every angle.

The Rochester Trailercar is built exceptionally low, making it easy to load and unload.

It will carry a load at a speed of from 25 to 35 miles, safely and without skidding or jostling.

The Rochester Trailercar is the only trailercar that will back, and that tracks perfectly.

The farmer, gardener, dairyman, and storekeeper can use the trailercar to good advantage —it will save time—save money—save bother.

It can be attached to any make of motor car.

Curing the "Leprosy"

THIRTY-FOUR children and eleven grown-ups composed the Sunday school in an old church building within walking distance of Tuskegee. An elderly man of kindly face and earnest manner was trying to teach the adult class. The lesson was on Naaman the leper. "Now y'all sees, bredderin, dis yer leopard was a great and dreful beas'; he prowls erround o' nights to get his rations, and den in de day he sleeps hisself in shadder of some great rock in de forris', and dis yer man Naaman he done come erlong in de night, and he fin's de rock a good shelter, and he sleeps in de same spot, and dat is how come he got de leprosy." And this was being received as Bible instruction. The earnestness of the man's face and the seriousness of his purpose silences criticism, but deepens the conviction that somehow new forces must be brought into this important but unused factor in character development, the negro Sunday school.

In the South eighty thousand colored students are enrolled in two hundred and eighty-three educational institutions of six or more teachers. Surely these young people, with all the advantages of a training made possible by gracious gifts to mission schools, ought to furnish an ever increasing number of qualified and efficient Sunday school leaders and teachers. But until recently all the facts were otherwise. Every advance in education has carried the students away from the home church, and put them out of sympathy and fellowship with home conditions. A little education is liable to make one superficial and critical. Fine generous sympathy and the spirit of helpfulness come only with a wider knowledge and a deeper understanding of fundamental truth. The spirit of service is only implanted by a higher fellowship with Jesus. The first impulse was to make every advance in education contribute to personal gain. Money value was the first consideration. Personal position, to command others, to be envied and admired, and especially to be free from the necessity of manual toil—these bulked large as the objective of education. That epoch in Negro education is passing, and the younger generation, children and grandchildren of the graduates from these mission schools, respond more quickly to the larger life appeals. Here, then, is the source of supply for the better-trained teachers for the local Sunday schools. Here is a wealth of "pay dirt" in an unworked mine.

For five years the International Sunday School Association through its Committee on Work among the Negroes has been stressing the importance of special training for Sunday school teachers to the students of all these educational institutions. The response has been cordial and enthusiastic. Beginning with an enrolment of one hundred and fifty in nine colleges in 1912, the growth has been gradual and permanent. This year the Sunday school teacher training classes are organized in 94 institutions with an enrolment of 2,864. The total number of classes in five years is 297, with an enrolment of 7,165. The work has met with so much favor and has so evidently met a real need that 44 institutions have made it a part of the curriculum, and give a school credit.

These earnest young college men and women are learning that "The Way of the Cross Leads Home." They are being sent back to their native settlements not only to wrest a better living from a reluctant soil, but fitted to lead the children and the old folks, too, to that better living which can be founded only upon a true understanding of the Word of God.

H. C. LYMAN.

Sir Percy Lake. This expedition at on time approached within six miles of K but was driven back and finally wa permanently halted about twenty mi down the river, where it has fought th Turks and floods with equal gallantry nd with equal success. Attempts to provi n General Townshend by aeroplane an y sending light-draft steamers up th iver under cover of darkness alike fai l, and with his provisions gone, and he hope of succor too greatly defer l, General Townshend destroyed his unitions and surrendered to the Tu s with the remainder of his forces. It s announced that the surrender inclu d 2,970 British troops and 6,000 Ind ns.

(the Caucasian front since the ap re of Trebizond the Russians have bee unable apparently to make much ur er progress. South of Bitlis in the nter the Turks have gained ground at e expense of the Russians, forcing the later to retreat northward.

e British report progress in the Ge an East Africa campaign, and ha occupied the towns of Newbugwe and alange as well as Kondoa. There has lso been some rather severe fighting Egypt in a region where it was ho ht that the British had cleared the untry of their foes.

(April 23 the British were attacked y e enemy early in the morning at On ar. In the fight at this point the Brit more than held their own, putting he enemy to flight and inflicting eve punishment on him, but in an th attack on the village of Quatia they in their turn were obliged, as they put it, "to withdraw" after a ar engagement. The Turks report the pture in this engagement of 300 me nd 20 officers of the Worcester-ir including the colonel.

T spring floods and rains are seri-usl interfering with the fighting in ur e, judging from nearly all the po s, and very possibly these con-iti s will continue for some days to om in some of the fields of action at as This was particularly true of e ussian front and as a result but ery ttle was reported from that front e st week, and that little of no im-rt ce, merely an occasional skir-ish r an isolated artillery duel. Much the same condition prevailed on the Austro-Italian front, and consequently that front, too, will have to be passed by with this mention merely.

The conditions mentioned above have also had considerable influence on the fighting on the western line, particularly on the Verdun front, where on the whole during the past week the fighting has been much lighter than at any time since this battle began, and has been mostly confined to artillery bombardments of greater or less severity of the important strategic points, such as Hill 304 and Cumières on the western front, and the region south of Douaumont and Vaux on the northern. Some infantry actions have taken place, but these have been nearly all in the last mentioned regions and have not been of major importance, nor have they resulted in any change of moment in the position of the opposing lines.

There was some little activity in Alsace and in Lorraine, but nothing of any great importance, though the fact that Germany has closed her Swiss frontier may indicate an important troop movement on this eastern end of the line which may be preliminary to an offensive in Alsace, the only region where the French are on German soil.

On the western end of the line there has been continual skirmishing day and night, south of St. Eloi, which seems to be increasing in vehemence. On the Ypres front also there has been occasional activity, but this has been resultless. On the rest of the line the activity has not been very great.

The airmen have been very active and there have been a number of raids on the enemy's lines, particularly in the center of the line; the real amount of damage done, however, is rather questionable.

The Russian troops whose landing at Marseilles was reported in last week's Christian Herald numbered apparently about 5,000 men. They were rushed north to a military camp between Lyons and the fighting front, but none of the Russian units have been reported in action. The arrival of two more detachments of Russian troops has been reported at Marseilles, but no statements have been made as to the strength of these detachments. It has been apparent since the beginning of the Verdun battle that the French were saving men, frequently at the expense of tactical advantage, since counter-charges which would be indicated by the logic of events have not been made. It is probably therefore that the sending of Russian troops was prompted as much by French necessities as by Russian friendship.

The British Note

(From the New York Evening Mail, April 26.)

TODAY, on April 26, 1916, is published the British answer to our note of October 21, 1915, nc ing the British "blockade." t six months which the leisurely ve ment of his majesty has taken to ep e its reply, a masterpiece of er re could have been produced. f as length goes, the note is unex-ap l. It is over 13,000 words, a rit le book. The British may fairly in that they have broken the dip-na long-distance record, both in e e they took to answer and in the gi de of their effort.

Th English contention of 13,000 rd can be answered in one-tenth at mber. There is no easier way to d e British web than by using the ry eans this note puts in our hands. th, as in previous communications, e im is made that during the civil r, our blockade of the Confederacy, t k measures against British trade th e southern states which now jus-y itain in her measures against r de with Germany.

Th true nature of the British posi-n very clearly brought out by tr ting their present "blockade" h r civil war blockade, which they l on for a precedent. Whoever takes the trouble to recall the facts will find himself assured that the British contention is false, namely, that during the civil war our blockading squadron established precedents which now prevent us from abolishing the present British lawlessness.

On March 11, 1915, England announced that she would stop all goods she could seize going to or from Germany directly or via neutral countries. England calls this an Order in Council; she has never dared to call it a blockade. That is why people write British "blockade" with quotation marks. A blockade of Germany, to be lawful, must be a naval operation effectually shutting all neutrals out of all German ports. But Britain dare not send her fleet into the Baltic and invest the German ports of Lubeck and Stettin. With these ports the Scandinavian countries trade unhindered. The very essence of a blockade is that it shall be effective and bear equally on all neutrals. So the thinking citizen discovers why England does not call its action a blockade.

With no blockade existing, Britain's lawful interference with our German trade is restricted to the right to search

"I know an easy way to clear your skin"

Bathe your face for several minutes with Resinol Soap and warm water, working the creamy lather into the skin gently with the finger-tips. Then wash off with more Resinol Soap and warm water, finishing with a dash of clear, cold water to close the pores.

Do this once or twice a day, and you will be astonished how quickly the healing Resinol medication soothes and cleanses the pores, lessens the tendency to pimples, and leaves the complexion clearer, fresher and more velvety.

If the skin is in bad condition through neglect or an unwise use of cosmetics apply a little Resinol Ointment and let it remain on ten minutes before the final washing with Resinol Soap.

Resinol Soap is sold by all druggists and dealers in toilet goods. For trial size, free, write to Dept. 9-D, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

OUR CULMINATING OFFER

IN THE

is given below. It enables you to secure all the 60 pictures, "Gems from the Bible" (the official list of Bible verses), and the Reply Book, by securing for us a new short trial subscription of eight months at $1.00. If you haven't entered the Contest, do so immediately through that offer. You have plenty of time to solve each picture to your entire satisfaction, for you cannot submit your set until June 19th at the earliest (we will be compelled to refuse and return sets submitted before that date) and you need not put your set in the mail box until July 17th!

Send in your order NOW, and you will have more than two months, after receiving your equipment, to prepare your answers. Secure a friend's subscription for eight months, or, if you wish, present the subscription to some friend (as many delighted contestants did) paying the dollar yourself.

Rewards? Yes; 419 of them in cash, aggregating $3,500.00. BUT, every contestant acquires a rich store of choicest Bibl memory verses in his search through the "Gems from the Bible", which far outvalues and will long outlast any cash reward

What You Will Receive for Securing a New Eight Months' Subscription

The entire series of 60 pictures are now for the first time all available to new contestants. You will secure them all together, with "Gems from the Bible" (the list of 2,000 verses) and Reply Book. Couldn't you find a verse represented by that scene below?

The Entire Sixty Pictures of the Bible Picture Contest are given you, all together, with the "Gems from the Bible" and Reply Book. Think how that simplifies the Contest for you—instead of having to find fitting verses for each instalment of the pictures, as they appeared in the Christian Herald, and thus having to go over the "Gems" time after time, you will be able to spread the 60 pictures out on the table in front of you, and familiarize yourself with each one. Then you will go through the verses in the "Gems" carefully, and write down each verse that seems to you to fit a picture. Lastly, you will transfer the best fitting verses to your Reply Book, and send that in as your set. You've plenty of time to compete without being hurried—but no time to delay! Accept the $1.00 offer at once, or one of the offers given below. And start now!

Merry Moments

MIRTH is like medicine to life:
It soothes its ills, it calms its strife;
It softly smoothes the brow of care,
And writes a thousand graces there.

ORIGINAL anecdotes, full of real fun, will be welcomed for this column, and only these will be paid for.

TENDER MEMORIES.—In a certain town a man went into a restaurant for his noonday meal, and it being a cold day, the door was closed. He sat down a few tables from the door. Presently another man came in who neglected to shut the door. The first man noticed it and yelled at him gruffly: "Shut that door! Were you raised in a barn?" After a few seconds he glanced over to where the other man was sitting and noticed he was sobbing. He went over and apologized for talking in such a manner. "I didn't mean to be so rude in asking you if you had been raised in a barn—" "That's it—that's it," he sobbed; "I was raised in a barn, and it makes me homesick every time I hear an ass bray." (Contributor please send address.)

THE WILL TO DO.—Jim Smith was notoriously slow pay. He owed quite a bill at the grocery for pork. One day, as his credit was becoming strained, he walked calmly into the grocery, and said, "Mr. Black, I want to pay you for the pork I have had, and I want some more." "Certainly," said the delighted proprietor, as he hastened to wait on his customer. Taking the package of pork, Jim Smith started to go. "Wait a minute," said the proprietor; "I thought you wanted to pay for that pork." "I do," remarked Jim, as he resumed his homeward way, "but I can't."

HOW HE WAS IMPRESSED.—"Was the sermon today to your liking, John?" inquired the pastor. "Indeed, sir, it was a grand sermon," said John with genuine admiration. "What part seemed to take hold of you?" "Well, now, since you ask me, I'll tell you. What took hold of me most was your perseverance—the way you went over the same thing again and again and again."

AS OTHERS SEE US.—Another school year had passed successfully on the mission station. The program was over; the graduates had received their diplomas, and the missionaries were being congratulated, when a native priest rose and asked permission to address the students. "Children," he said earnestly, "you see before you these American missionaries. Any one who has studied history knows that they are the descendants of wild, barbarous tribes of Indian savages. But see how remarkably they have developed. If you continue to study and be obedient you also, some day, may become like them."

YOUTHFUL FORESIGHT.—One of the diminutive flower maidens at a school fête attended by the Queen Mother was both pretty and plump, and when Her Majesty stopped for an instant to smile down upon her, what did she do but put up her wee mouth for a kiss, which she received.

"Molly!" gasped her astounded mother, after the distinguished visitor had passed on. "How could you?"

Molly gave good reason. "I fought," said she, "it 'ud be interestin' to tell my gran'children."

A HELPFUL SERMON.—A city minister gave a most scathing discourse on the evil effects produced by bad example, and exhorted all good members of his congregation not to countenance by their presence such a place of iniquity as a near-by amusement resort. At this one of the church wardens, in evident excitement, snapped his fingers.

At the close of the service a member accosted the church warden and said:

"How was that for a sermon?"

"Great. Why, it reminded me that's the place where I left my umbrella."—Exchange.

FOLLOWED IT ON SHORE.—"Would ye do something for a poor old sailor?" inquired the wanderer at the gate.

"Poor old sailor?" said the lady at work over the washtub.

"Yessum. I followed the water for sixteen years."

"Well," said the woman, as she resumed her labors, "you certainly don't look as if you ever caught up with it."—Sailor's Magazine.

WELL SHOD.—A little boy only six years old was boasting that he worked in a blacksmith shop. "What do you do there?" he was asked. "Do you shoe horses?" "No, sir!" he answered promptly. "I shoo flies."—Our Dumb Animals.

ALL TOO TRUE.—Professor: "What three words are used most among college students?"

Weary Fresh: "I don't know."

Professor: "Correct."—University of Michigan Awgwan.

IDENTIFIED.—"You haven't forgotten us, have you, waiter?"

"Oh, no, sir. You are the two fried smelts."—Judge.

GLASS OF WATER
Upset Her

People who don't know about food should never be allowed to feed persons with weak stomachs.

Sometime ago a young woman who lives in Me. had an attack of scarlet fever, and when convalescing was permitted to eat anything she wanted. Indiscriminate feeding soon put her back in bed with severe stomach and kidney trouble.

"There I stayed," she says, "three months, with my stomach in such condition that I could take only a few teaspoonfuls of milk or beef juice at a time. Finally Grape-Nuts was brought to my attention and I asked my doctor if I might eat it. He said, 'yes,' and I commenced at once.

"The food did me good from the start and I was soon out of bed and recovered from the stomach trouble. I have gained ten pounds and am able to do all household duties, some days sitting down only long enough to eat my meals. I can eat anything that one ought to eat, but I still continue to eat Grape-Nuts at breakfast and supper and like it better every day.

"Considering that I could stand only a short time, and that a glass of water seemed 'so heavy,' I am fully satisfied that Grape-Nuts has been everything to me and that my return to health is due to it.

"I have told several friends having nervous or stomach trouble what Grape-Nuts did for me and in every case they speak highly of the food."

"There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The British Note

German-bound vessels for contraband of war; our other goods—like foodstuffs and cotton—must be allowed to pass free. Britain has no right to touch a single shipment moving from Germany to us. To the extent that Britain in her restrictions on our German trade is exceeding this limitation on our exports of contraband—to this extent Britain is acting in defiance of international law.

When we look at the plain facts we find that Britain has not only killed our trade with Germany but has crippled our trade with European neutrals, on the excuse that they might be letting food and supplies through to Germany. To be specific, the thinking citizen will find that the Holland-American Line boats dare not accept a shipment for Holland not certified by the British consul-general in New York. If the boat carried such a shipment it would be taken to a British port, searched and detained at a loss (in earnings) to the owners of $2,000 per day. The British consul-general will approve only shipments consigned to the Netherlands Oversea Trust, a "British-led, British-ruled" band of Dutch merchants who have given England a heavy cash bond that they will allow nothing to move through to England's enemy. But no commodity may go even to these consignees unless it is on an export embargo list which Holland has been forced to enact, designed against Germany. The Scandinavian countries, lest they starve for want of overseas supplies, have been driven into just such a situation as Holland.

It is this unheard-of interference in commerce between America and neutral Europe that England seeks to justify by civil war precedents.

When Britain establishes the conditions we maintained in the civil war by interposing a blockade squadron in the Baltic—then we shall allow her to call our Bermuda cases to her help and not before. Britain cannot assume the privileges of a blockade without accepting the responsibilities.

Even if Britain were maintaining a blockade of Germany—which she is not—our Matamoros cases would forbid her to stop any of our exports to Holland except contraband of war, demonstrably moving to Germany.

President Wilson knows this. Washington will not be confused with the fine phrases of the British note. Nor need any American be confused, if he cares to examine the facts. We know that in the civil war we did nothing that now ties our hands. We know that today America is the arbiter, judge, protector of international law, which today we apply on behalf of the peaceful world. "In cases such as that now in judgment we administer the public law of nations." We shall administer it against both Germany's and Great Britain's wrong-doings with even-handed justice.

Receiver for American Real Estate Company

THE general public was shocked last week by the announced receivership of the American Real Estate Company.

This organization, among the largest engaged in real estate operations in New York City, has been in existence over twenty-seven years, during which time the securities of the company have been sold to men and women investors throughout the United States. Some of its realty holdings include high-class properties in the most prosperous mercantile and residential sections of New York City. Generally speaking, the American Real Estate Company was held in excellent standing in real estate circles engaged in selling securities to the public on what was claimed to be a safe investment basis.

Suburban interests based on a future increase in values of real estate along the prospected suburban lines on the upper West Side, in the Bronx, and at the terminal of the Second Avenue line of the Dual Subway System in Astoria and Queens, assisted in putting a burden on the company, and over-taxed its resources.

In June, 1915, the building and loan commissioner of Connecticut refused to give the company a license to do business in that state, and this caused a large withdrawal of bondholders, which resulted in widespread apprehension among investors holding the company's bonds in other sections. The following statement of the company presents the situation from a viewpoint which must be accepted as defining the company's attitude:

> As is well known, for some time past the real estate market in and about the city of New York has been much depressed, and properties indisputably of great present and prospective value have frequently been found to be unsalable except at improvident and ruinous sacrifice. Under ordinary conditions the American Real Estate Company would have been able to continue in the conduct of its business with reasonable assurance of substantial profit and prompt meeting of all obligations. During the past year, however, an unusual number of holders of the bonds of the company have elected to demand payment, and this has required the expenditure of large sums of money out of principal in order to meet these obligations. The result of continuing business under such conditions would be to force the company to sacrifice many of its valuable assets at forced sale in order to meet and pay in full the claims of bondholders electing to surrender, and this course would be to the prejudice of the other creditors equally entitled to payment in full and equally entitled to protection so far as lies within the power of the officers and directors of the company.
> The real estate market has not yet recovered from its depression and the bondholders are filing large numbers of surrenders.
> The company has now outstanding more than $13,000,000 of bonds, of which over $1,000,000 will mature within the coming twelve months, and in addition, over $11,000,000 of bonds can be made to mature at the election of the holders within twelve months. As it is practically certain that the company will not be able to sell and dispose of a sufficient amount of its real estate holdings within the next year, except at a sacrifice of real values, it has seemed, as stated above, to the officers and board of directors, advisable and proper that receivers should be appointed for the protection of the property and conservation of the assets. Otherwise the interests of all classes of creditors and stockholders might be sacrificed.
> On January 1, 1916, the company owned real property of the total appraised valuation of $24,627,745.93, as shown in the last annual report, against which there were mortgages amounting in the aggregate to $9,952,970. On the basis of this valuation, the assets of the company were sufficient to pay all the outstanding obligations and capital stock in full.
> In the judgment of directors there should be a prompt readjustment under a conservative agreement of reorganization which will enable the properties to be realized upon without unnecessary sacrifice and protect the interest of creditors and stockholders.
> It is therefore recommended that a reorganization committee be promptly appointed in the interest of the creditors and stockholders with authority to investigate the condition of the company, its liabilities and the value of its properties and thereupon to formulate a plan of reorganization and liquidation, and the officers and directors will in every way aid in the preparation and consummation of such a plan so far as such committee may desire their cooperation.

The American Real Estate Company issued bonds and stocks on the properties they were developing and had developed, and sold them to the public. The public included all classes of investors, and the securities were scattered throughout the greater part of the United States. Possibly some were held in every state in the Union. During the last few years real estate in New York City has been under extreme depression, and the American Real Estate Company has been carrying a big load. Rentals have been low, and tenants not plentiful, while buyers of properties have been very scarce. If business had been good, if the boom as witnessed in 1906 and 1907 had prevailed, the American Real Estate Company probably would have continued to prosper, and its speculative investments in suburban property would have yielded good profits; instead of that an unprecedented period of depression in real estate covering more than eight years has resulted in the present embarrassment of the company.

Two Worth-While Books

The two volumes described below ill be a worth-while addition to any ne library. If you are about to renew our subscription to The Christian Herald ke advantage of one of these special rs, adding the small additional amoun required.

Real People and Dreams

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., does not ke up her stories and poems—they just m themselves on the background of her nd as winter sprites trace wonderful pi res on windowpanes, and then simply be use she cannot help herself, she sets d a description of these pictures. Ther re in all, in her new book, "Real Peopl nd Dreams," about eighty poems and ty-two short stories and sketches. T is the work of a genius.

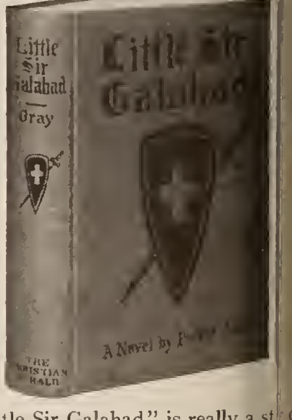
We will send this new volume by Ma ret E. Sangster, Jr., handsomely bound in th, with a new photographic frontispi of Margaret E. Sangster herself, and with us-trations for a number of the poems, to her with the Christian Herald for one ole year, postpaid, for $1.85. Or, we will s to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward his volume for sending us one new yearl ub-scription to the Christian Herald with 50.

Little Sir Galahad

We do not know when we have had ite as much pleasure in reading any boo his year as "Little Sir Galahad." There so much that is charming and humorou and intensely human in the whole story t it appeals to the reader probably with g ter force than if the action were on a ore dignified level.



"Little Sir Galahad" is really a st o the golden age in our own time. That au-tiful season that makes life radiant hile it lasts.

It is as good a story as we have e un-tered in many a day, and that's sa g a good deal.

"Little Sir Galahad," 376 pages, illus ted and handsomely bound in cloth, w be sent postpaid with one yearly subscr ion to the Christian Herald for $2.00. Or, will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a r rd, this volume for sending us one new rly subscription to the Christian Heral ith $1.50.

THERE are millions of happy children—like this little girl with the little curl — bright-eyed and eager for Kellogg's Toasted Corn Flakes and good top milk, a little at a time, poured in at the side of the bowl.

Little folks recognize the delicious oven-flavor of Kellogg's — the original. Their knowing little appetites are responsible for the constantly increasing popularity of Kellogg's—everywhere.

It is a remarkable fact that there is no storage space at Kellogg's. Each day's production is shipped crisp from the ovens in the Kellogg WAXTITE package — that keeps the fresh, good flavor in and all other flavors out.

ANNOUNCING A MID-YEAR MODEL

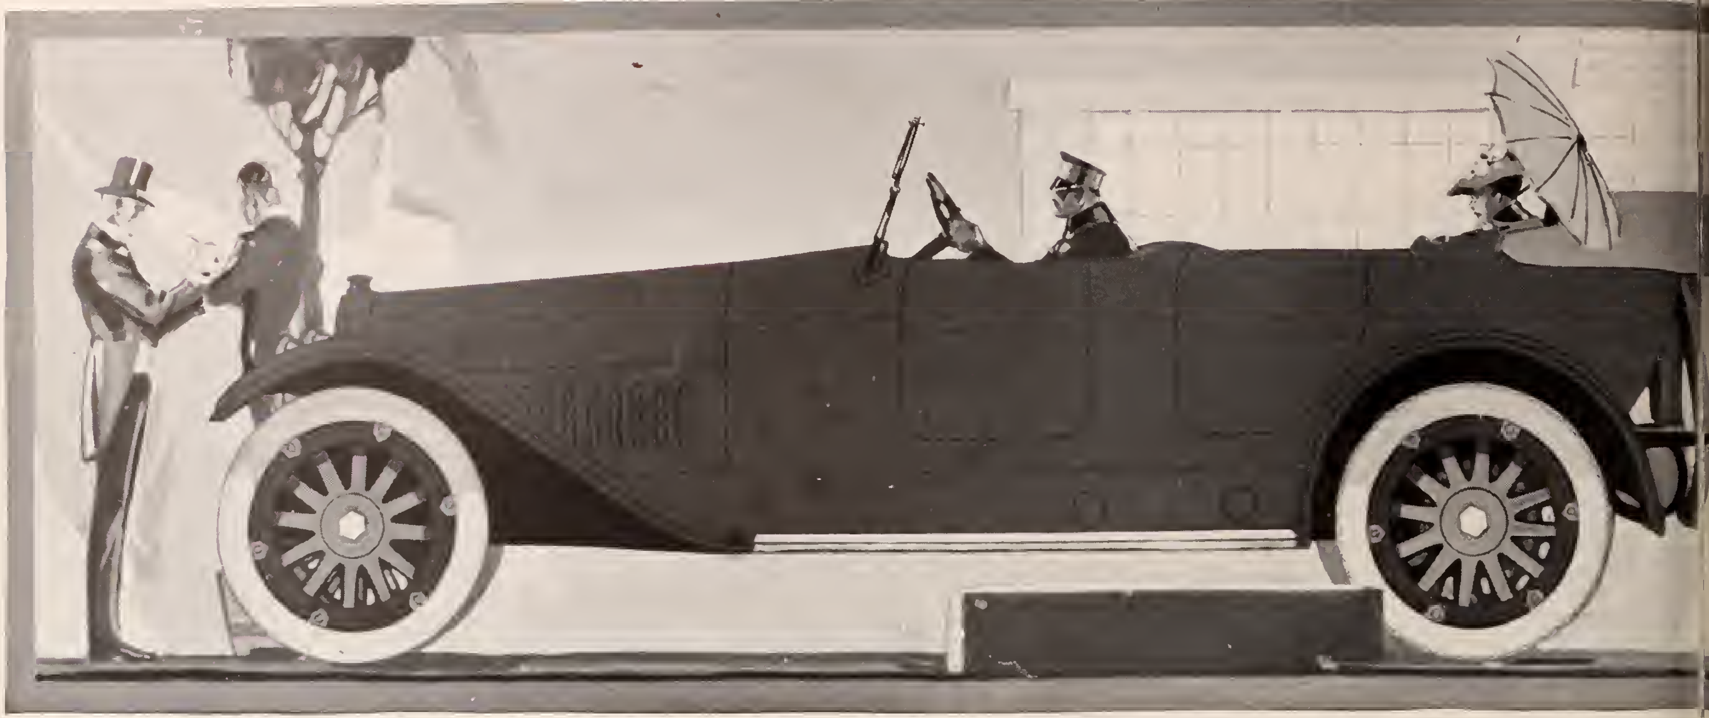
Mitchell

$1325 Combining the B st
From 257 Show Mod s



26 Extra Features

Unique to the Mitchell—Paid for by Factory Savings

This is to tell you how factory efficiency has cut 10,000 costs on the Mitchell car.

How we build it for half what it would have cost, even in 1910.

How we build it for 20 per cent less than other factories could build it now.

And how, by those savings, we give you 26 extras which you don't find in other cars.

John W. Bate
The Efficiency Expert

In 1903—when Mitchell cars were first built—we brought John W. Bate to Racine. He was even then the greatest expert in factory efficiency in the metal-working line.

Our vehicle factory was then 70 years old. It was a model efficiency plant. And we started then to make our motor car plant the most efficient of its kind in America.

10,000 Costs Reduced

In the 13 years since, Mr. Bate has reduced more than 10,000 motor car costs.

He built this whole plant—covering 45 acres—so cars could come through without the loss of a second. He equipped it with 2092 labor-saving machines—the most efficient machines that are known in this industry.

He has eliminated from the Mitchell almost every casting. In place of them he uses 184 drop forgings, which are three times as strong. Also 256 steel stampings, tough and stanch.

He has invested $5,000,000 so fine cars could be built here for less than anywhere else. No other factory which builds cars of this class can compare with it.

Not One Cent Wasted

Some motor car makers buy all their parts. Most makers buy the larger share. But 98 per cent of this Mitchell car is built in this model plant. Thus we save under others from 20 to 40 per cent.

Part of this saving is shown in our price. No other high-grade Six of the Mitchell size sells at the Mitchell price.

The rest of the saving pays for 26 extras. We give you 26 features which others don't offer. No car in our class has more than two of them. No car at any price has more than four.

Go see these extra features. You will want every one of them. And you will not, we think, buy a car which omits them.

257 Cars in One

This New Mitchell model came out April 15—from four to eight months later than other current models.

This model was completed after the New York Show. There our experts and designers examined 257 new models. And t y picked out the best of the new styles in ll of them—from ours and from others- n body design and equipment.

Six cylinders—high-power, high-speed motor—127-inch wheelbase. Anti-skid tires on rear. Complete modern equipment, including motor-driven tire pump.

$1325 F. O. B. Racine for 5 Passenger Touring Car or 3-Passenger Roadster. 7-Passenger Body $35 Extra. New Mitchell Eight, $1450 f. o. b. Racine.

Thus the New Mitchell combines all e best things brought out at the New Y k Show. Its lines and its luxuries—its w ideas in equipment—are the finest showr

All this in addition to the 26 unique tures which other cars don't offer.

Where Mitchell is Firs

In ease of riding the Mitchell car sta ls first. Any Mitchell dealer can prove t t in five minutes. No other car in the w d contains the Bate cantilever springs.

The Mitchell rides the roughest r d as a boat rides waves. This comfort ll astound you.

The Mitchell stands first as regards d bility. Six Mitchell cars have avera d 164,372 miles each. In ordinary dri g that is more than 30 years' service.

The Mitchell is the easiest car to dr . That's because of its oversize steering pa s, fitted with ball bearings.

The Mitchell is long and roomy—127-i h wheelbase. It is powerful. In every y it gives greater value than other Si s, because of our factory economies. An it includes 26 features—all costly and im tant—which other cars don't offer.

Let the nearest Mitchell dealer show t e extras to you. He has this new model n . If you don't know him, ask us for his na .

"Oh Hombre, Socorro!"

Being an Account of How the Laymen of the Christian Church Seek to Answer This Great Cry of Unsaved Races "O Man, Help!"

By WILLIAM B. ASHLEY

THE title that first occurred to me for this article was "Continental Hall vs. The Capitol," and you will see why in a moment. But I knew that the editor would frown on su a title as unpatriotic, and so when this that has be used suggested itself (in a way that you will read fuher on), I decided to show you how the other one w ld have fitted.

had just been looking over our senators and re esentatives in Congress assembled. It is true the was nothing particular before either House ot r than national business of importance, and so w t I saw might not be typical of Congress. The pr iding officer in each case was engaged in studying — least the attitude indicated study—some book or de ument, and emerged from his study at sudden in rvals, his gavel resounding upon the desk, to recogni some member, or to announce that "the gentlem 's time is expired," bang! Somewhat lower on the te aced dais of the chamber, two or three men loafed at heir desks ready for whatever duty might present it f. Still farther down and almost on a level with th floor were still other members of the routine staff.

he semi-circular rows of desks and comfortable ch rs that face the presiding officers' desks were fil with free and independent American air, for the m t part. In the Senate possibly a score of gentlemen ha displaced the air and reclined in the chairs in at udes of great ease and nonchalance. Generally sp king, they were in little groups and held conversa on with each other while some member, less fo unate for the moment, labored to convince the U ed States Senate that agriculture is the basis of al human prosperity. A hum and jangle of voices m e it difficult for visitors in the galleries to hear w t was said on the floor.

the House there are more chairs than in the Se ate, but no more of them were occupied, and the m bers who were present were even more nonchala if that is possible, more at ease, more conversa onal. Here, too, a diligent patriot labored to im ess the 440 representatives whose filled or empty ch rs confronted him, with the peril that threatened th nation through any chance inattention to the bill w h that member was advocating. In both Houses di ified and unhurried men strolled in and out and ba and forth, now bending over a colleague to im rt some state secret or ask his intentions for the ev ing, now linking arms with some other stroller to di ppear into mysterious regions outside. Pages hu ied about as though intent on giving the public se ed in the galleries a fair idea of the bustling m hods which prevail in sessions of Congress. There we many spectators: they very far outnumbered th bjects of their attention below. Personally, I was di led in my interest between awe-struck regard of ou national legislators and curiosity as to what these A rican citizens in the galleries thought about it all.

THEN presently, I had passed through the spacious halls of the capitol, down its great steps, or be een the rows of beautiful buttonwood trees that li the approaches from Pennsylvania Avenue, and ha found myself within the precincts of the White H se and inside the doors of the Continental Hall, the sh ow of the Washington Monument almost upon it.

Here, too, was assembled a congress; and here, too, in the galleries were spectators; and here, too, on a raised platform was a presiding officer and his coworkers. And here, too, were being considered matters of national importance. The spectators, it happened, were mostly members of the families of the men who were delegates to the congress, the National Missionary Congress of the Laymen's Missionary Movement. Someone was speaking from the platform and every man of the nearly 1,000 present was sitting alert and attentive. Excepting for the speaker's voice, the room was in absolute quietness. There was a sense of close interest in the subject under discussion, an atmosphere of deep sympathy with it. One almost instantly caught the impression that these men were representatives of a great constituency, and were determined to serve their constituency well.

And as that session of the Laymen's Missionary Congress proceeded, and the earnestness and enthusiasm of it caught me up, and the tremendous reality with which these men of business and affairs invested their mission shone out, and the fact became more and more outstanding that this was a congress devoted to the highest interests of its country, with the keynote of "Sacrifice" sounding throughout all its deliberations, the idea of starting this story with the title "Continental Hall vs. The Capitol" occurred to me. (Let me hasten to say, and be done with it, what really should go without saying: that it is not wise to think too seriously about the purely perfunctory sessions of our Congress, and forget the sessions that make history, nor the committee meetings, the consultations and the entire round of Congressional routine which grinds out the nation's vast legislative business with little regard for the personal comfort of the members.)

Nevertheless, I like to think that in Continental Hall from Wednesday April 26 through Sunday April 30, a congress was in session whose deliberations may have results as important in our national life, as important in the world at large, as have grown out of any session of our national body. Before taking up some of the things that were said and done in Continental Hall, however, just a brief review of what these thousand men represented.

THE Laymen's Missionary Movement began on the first centennial anniversary of the now famous haystack prayer meeting held by five students at Williamstown, Mass., in 1806. During the anniversary exercises in November, 1906, the Laymen's Missionary Movement evolved, and was shortly after recognized by the various missionary boards of the denominations, then reached over and took root in Canada and then in many foreign countries, and within three years was so thoroughly organized as to conduct its first national missionary campaign in the United States (1909-10). The scope of the movement is epitomized in the following official statement:

> The movement seeks to enrich the spiritual life of men, that they may be constructive factors in extending the kingdom of Christ;
> Brings the men of all churches together on a common platform to consider the whole problem of Christianity in the world and plan for its solution;
> Has the confidence and active cooperation of the churches of North America;
> Does not administer missionary funds or work, but helps to enlarge and strengthen the regular work of all the churches;
> Has had much to do with securing the adoption by all churches of the best methods of missionary education and of church and missionary finance;
> Has helped to increase the contributions of North American churches to missionary purposes and also to their own local expenses by many millions of dollars;
> Employs the full time of ten men to direct and supervise the work;
> Is supported by the voluntary contributions of a small number of men and women, some of whom contribute individually the total support of one secretary.

Last October the second national missionary campaign, planned before the outbreak of the war, was begun despite serious suggestions that it be postponed. It has been a record campaign from start to finish. In the series of sixty-nine conventions that preceded the national convention in Washington, the total paid registration amounted to almost 102,000, a gain of over 42 per cent. over the registration of 1909-10. These 101,927 men, in their discussions of ways and means to extend the teachings of the Christian faith, represented thousands of congregations and hundreds of thousands of communicants, and during the entire decade just past the Movement held in all nearly 3000 conferences and conventions with a total attendance of approximately a million men.

The delegates at Washington represented something that in the past ten years has been largely instrumental in almost doubling the total contributions of the church and its organizations to missionary, educational and benevolent work in the United States. And they represented a something that has shown the church what her men can do when organized and consecrated, by astonishing results in many cities and towns; a something that has reached out into the whole world to lay hold of the hands of other men and lift them out of ignorance into the knowledge of God; a something that has stiffened the backbone of the entire missionary body; a something that has dared to call the work of the Kingdom of Christ the most important and noblest occupation to which men and women can consecrate their money and their talents today; a something that has lifted thousands upon thousands of indolent Christians out of their cushioned pews and set them shouting and singing in the rough highways and byways of a sin-darkened world; a something that dares to plan to carry out to the letter the Christ's command "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature," and to do it as though Christ had meant that it should be done in the lifetime of the present generation of Christian laymen.

So it was not surprising to hear the convention in Continental Hall sing as though they enjoyed it and as though they would send the words into the very hall of the national Congress, "Hark the voice of Jesus calling, 'Who will go and work today? Fields are white and harvests waiting; who will bear the sheaves away?'" And "Lead on, O King Eternal, till sin's fierce war shall cease, and holiness shall whisper the sweet amen of peace; for not with swords' loud clashing,

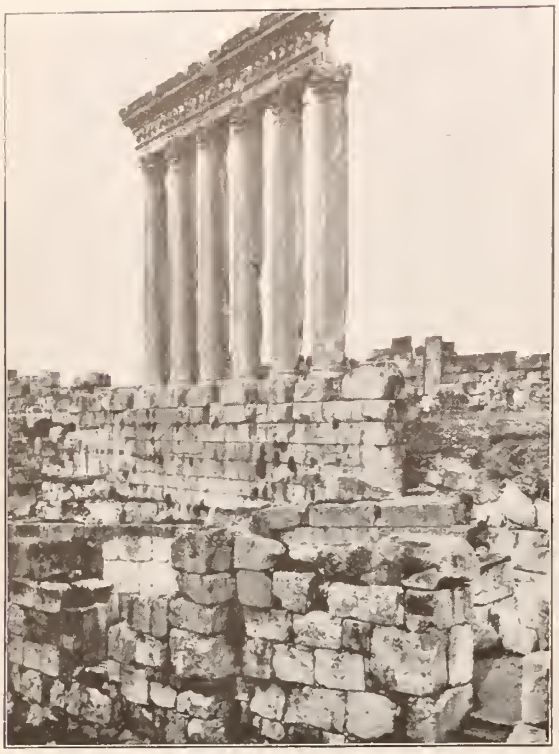
The Sun-Kissed Temples of Baalbek

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS



The six remaining pillars of the Temple of the Sun

BAALBEK is many things besides being a tourist center. For mass, the Egyptian temples lead. For intricacy of detail, the Indian gopurams surpass. For delicacy of design, the Taj Mahal will long hold the palm. But the ruins at Baalbek are both impressive and magnificent, inspiring, satisfying. The pyramid of Cheops is child's play compared with the many-ton entablature which surmounts the airy columns of the Temple of the Sun. A house can be moved up a hill, but by what machinery did the builders of Baalbek poise such a mass at such a height?

The village of Baalbek is a spot of green on a brown plain, along whose flanks snow-covered mountains stretch out in unbroken line. The miserable cluster of hovels, glorified by nature's greenery and Rome's architectural grandeur, shelters a race of weaklings who are ever reminded of a clan of Titans by ruins which they could never replace. Indeed, they have despoiled the ancient buildings until it is the unusual home that does not contain in its walls or over its doors some polished granite whose glassy surface was the work of master craftsmen long since dead.

Baalbek is situated at the base of the Jebel esh Sherki or Eastern Mountain, better known to us as the Anti-Lebanon, whose snows sometimes extend down to the town, itself four thousand feet above the sea. Numerous springs are found here, and graceful poplars and green vegetation stand out in pleasing contrast with the level brown or purplish tone of the plain.

Fifteen miles away the background of the picture stretches from eight-thousand-foot Sannin in the south to Dahr ul Khadib, whose blunt summit is nearly eleven thousand feet above the sea. In spring, when the newly plowed fields show a purple color, in the midst of which the new green of the early crops is beginning to appear, and when the snow line topping this background is sixty miles in length, the scene is one of entrancing beauty.

In this charming spot, where Nature must have impressed man with her grandeur and majesty, he vied with her in achieving the titanic. As one stands beside one of the fallen pillars, whose round base towers high above his head, it seems as though the ambitious builders had succeeded. The high containing walls shut in the view to center it on this mighty pile. But as one rides across the Bika on his way to the cedars of Lebanon and looks back on the ruins, the colossal group becomes but a tiny gem on Nature's bosom.

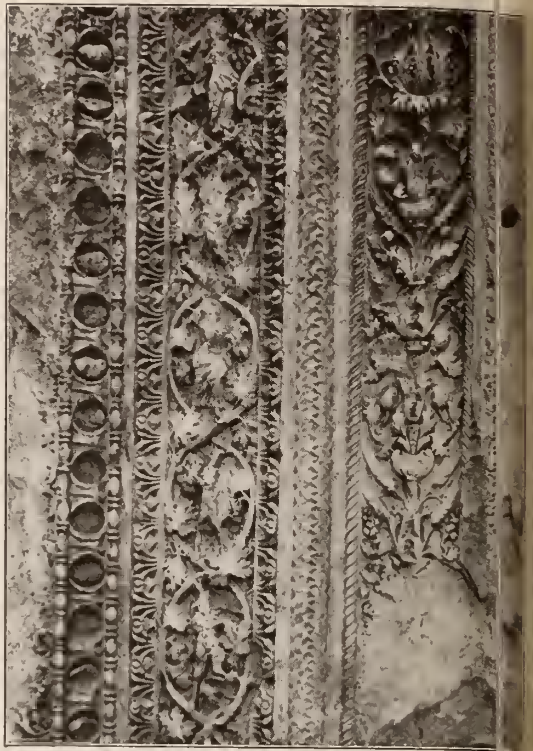
CAIN is said to have built the first temple at Baalbek, using the mastodon as his work animal for transporting stone. That makes Baalbek rather old. By the early Phœnician period Baalbek had become famous as the center of Baal worship. Since then, the Seleucidæ, the Romans, the Byzantines and the Saracens have ruled there. There is nothing in the ruins that tells the average tourist the history of these mighty structures, but Baedekers are handy if not cheap, and a Baedeker and a Bible are the prime necessities of Levantine travel.

Picture that famous church of Paris, the Madeleine, standing at a height of fifty feet above a level plain, surrounded by fifty-four columns nearly eight feet in diameter, whose bases alone are taller than a man, and you have some idea of the temple to Helios which gave Heliopolis its name. Today only six of the mighty columns remain erect, like proud sentinels guarding their fallen brothers. Each column is made up of three pieces, each twenty-two feet in height, making up with the cornice a total height of eighty feet. They are of a tawny shade, blushing with a brighter tint when the slanting light of sunrise or sunset falls across their stately height.

A great travel writer refers to these colossal columns as "bathed in the splendor of a thousand sunsets." No other description pictures them more truly. If the whole temple were standing in all of its imposing bulk, it could not be more impressive than those graceful columns, which look as though a strong wind would blow them over, but which have withstood earthquake and Arab for eighteen centuries. The drums are joined with copper rods, and the barbarous natives have chipped away the stone in many places to get the copper. In several places they have succeeded in getting it, though it took nearly four feet of digging through hard limestone to do so. Needless to say, this spoliation has not improved the beauty or stability of the columns.

Michel M. Alouf, a Syrian of Baalbek, thus describes the cornice: "The column is surmounted by a Corinthian capital, entablature, frieze and cornice, magnificently sculptured. The entablature presents a row of egg patterns surmounted by consoles with acanthus leaves, with a number of small lions and bulls carved on them. Higher up are tooth patterns and small roses, then a Greek key design. On the upper cornice, above each column, there are some lions' heads, with gaping jaws, which served as an issue for the rain water."

The part from the tooth pattern to the top is only half the total height, yet when I stood on the ground in front of one of these great blocks of exquisitely carved stone, which had fallen from its lofty height, I could barely reach up and touch the lion's jaws. How the Romans ever lifted these massive blocks to their lofty position above the capitals of the columns is a mystery. The Romans, prodigal as they seem to have been, never invested real money in the provinces. The wealth with which this wonderful temple was built was raised in Syria itself. Yet today the Turk, exacting in his demands, derives but a pittance from this fertile district.



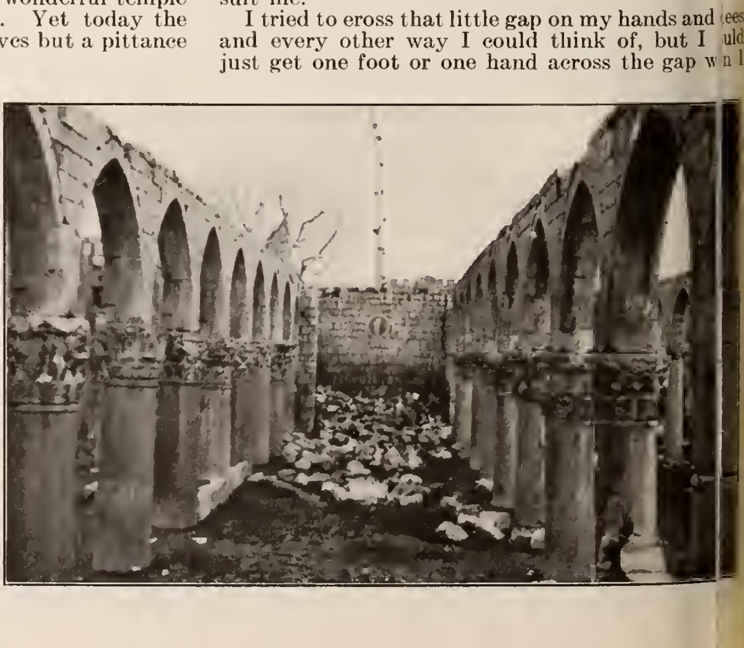
The carving around the doorway of the Temple of B hus

THE temple of Bacchus, which is the best pres ved of Syrian ruins, is quite apart from the eat temple of Jupiter, Helios, Baal, or the Sun. The finest thing about this temple is the front door lid stone, forty-three feet high and just half as ad. Hospitality with a capital H! The stone of the or-way is carved in the most intricate and la ike designs. Next to the door is a charming bea ork and leaf design. Then a twisted rope and a c entional vine and wheat design. Then more f ree that might have been carved with a tool as f as a cambric needle, and some figures of satyr and bacchantes, not so conventional. The door sts are nearly two feet wide, and the whole is made of sculpture that would grace even England's m erpiece, Melrose Abbey.

The great size and stability of the temples i ire confidence in the climber. A stairway leads the top of the cella walls—the solid walls of the t ple proper—which project for fifty feet above the gr nd. From the top of the stairway one has a fine view the surrounding country and also of the great stone hat await one below. As I was crossing just abo the great doorway, my foot slipped. It didn't slip ore than an inch. But that slip nearly scared me of a week's growth of beard that I was wearing the time. I looked back at the insignificant gap t I had jumped, and then down at the mass of solid one below. None of that lace-like stone was in sigh It all looked hard. I trembled so hard that I th ght I would shake the temple. I was on one side the gap and the only way down was on the oth I wanted to get down the worst way. Fallin off seemed the worst way to get down, but that n't suit me.

I tried to cross that little gap on my hands and ees and every other way I could think of, but I uld just get one foot or one hand across the gap w n I

The sacred spring, Ras El Ain, worshipped by builders of the primitive temples



The great mosque whose columns were taken from a score of ancient temples begi to conceive a liking for the place where I was. Arc id the outside of the temple runs a little line of mo ng and five feet above it another. This is abc a sheer drop of fifty feet, but I went around that mo ng over half the distance around the temple rat r than cross the gap which had been but a step unt my foot slipped. I have since had to undergo the unishment of seeing a woman in a fair narrow skirt jump across, but when I c e to that gap I am a thorough coward. Sou day I am going back there to force my f across that gap.

T s smaller temple is 227 feet long and abo half as wide, facing the rising sun. and ormerly approached by a fine stair- cas which was destroyed when the Ara built a fortress and wall in front of the arlier temple. Of the forty-two col- um which once surrounded it, only six- tee emain in place, yet from the back the tem e seems almost complete. On the sou side one of the fifty-foot columns has fall against the side of the temple, but so surely are its drums clamped together tha it remains whole although it has sma ed a hole in the wall.

T e keystone above the doorway dropped so after the earthquake in 1859 that a p of stones was necessary to hold it in plac but the stone has now been raised to original position, and the familiar car ng of the Roman eagle with long gar- lan in its beak can be seen. It was in this emple that the oracle of Baalbek was hou d and the secret passage by means of ich the priests entered the statue to pro im the fate of the land can still be seen. Theo- dos used this temple as a church for some time, pro bly while he was building the large basilica in fro of the larger temple.

I front of this smaller temple and to the right is a S acen citadel, which is principally interesting for its ntrance, whose arabesque design contrasts stra gely with the well-carved acanthus capitals of Ro n workmanship. The three styles of architec- tur are the Phœnician, represented by the retaining wal the Græco-Roman of the temples; and the Sar enic or Arab of the fortress and defense walls, bui of material stolen from the earlier work.

The great court, lying between the hexagonal court and the great temple, once contained the basilica, built by Constantine or Theodosius on the site of the pagan altar where formerly three negroes were sacrificed each festival day. Now it is strewn with granite columns taken from no one knows how many temples and brought from the utmost corners of the known world. Syenite columns from the quarries at Assuan, which only recently yielded up the granite for the great Assuan dam, lie about in profusion and bear the same glassy surface and wonderful polish that they had before earthquakes hurled them down and tourists began trying their knives on them.

Here, under Diocletian, several Christian martyrs gave up their lives. Here the golden statue of Jupiter was borne in festal procession by specially appointed bearers. Count Raymond of Giles laid siege to the city, but was repulsed by one of Salah-ud-din's lieutenants, and in 1401 the victorious and barbarous Tamerlane captured and despoiled the city.

The stone that "helps support six hotels, a dozen curio shops, a score of muleteers, and a station-master"

THERE are various other ruins in and near Baalbek: the temple of Venus, whose rites were such that Constantine the Great prohibited them; the great mosque, whose dissimilar columns were stolen by the Arabs from the Temple of the Sun, and which bears record of the fact that in the year 802 the Sultan abolished a tax, and added, "Whosoever shall attempt to reestablish this tax and whosoever shall substitute another for it, shall be cursed of God, of the angels and of all men."

Baalbek, like the circus, has one big show and many side shows, but unlike the circus, it is not likely to be moved during the night. There are in the wall, raised to a height twenty-three feet above the surrounding gardens, three blocks of stone, each as long and high as a full-sized Pullman car and twice as thick. Who brought them there and adjusted them so nicely that a knife blade cannot be inserted between them, nobody knows.

I had heard great stories about the pyramids, but after seeing the stones at Baalbek those of the great pyramid looked like children's building blocks. In the quarry is a stone on whose upper surface a troop of cavalry could stand (if it were a small enough troop). It is squared on five sides, but is not yet detached from mother earth. Murray's guide book says it would take 20,000 horsepower to move it, and it is doubtless safe to say that it could not be moved at all without the exertion of enough of a pull to wrench the earth out of its circuit. He says that it contains 11,500 cubic feet, and he must be right; but I only know that when I took a picture of it with my coat hanging on one corner, the coat was only a spot on the film.

The crude Arab story has it that a female giant was carrying it when she heard her baby cry. She dropped it there and no one has moved it since. If that baby hadn't drawn its mother's attention from her work, there would be today in the walls of the temple a stone seventy feet long and fifteen feet square. It is a large stone, and will no doubt sometime justify the amount of work that has been done

The Desert Shall Blossom Like a Rose

By PAUL HENRY DOWLING

SIDE by side with the great reclamation projects that are transforming the desert land of Southern California into immense tracts of oductiveness is the work of the des missionary. One of these men, wit his wife, travels over a circuit of two housand miles in a country parish of 2 00 square miles of mountains and des sands.

I San Bernardino County, said to be the rgest in the world, are the San Ber rdino Valley, only twenty by fort miles in extent, and known to those out n the desert as "the inside," and the tlying desert land which surrounds t. he valley, rich and populous, has gro s of lemon and orange; alfalfa; six citi and a dozen towns. Much of this lan s cactus-covered sand hills, but the wat of several rivers and irrigation dit s is reclaiming a vast area. Most of t people are real homesteaders, liv- ing small houses and sometimes cab- ins shale or huts of adobe, sometimes ma miles apart. They are hard work- ing nd eager toilers—these American sett rs.

T desert missionaries, Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Josselyn, have been placed in the field by the Sunday School Associations of Southern California and San Bernardino County, and are now working under the American Sunday School Union. When they took up the work in San Bernardino County a little over four years ago, there were but three Sunday schools in this large territory. There were thirty settlement points with no form of worship. At present, there are thirty-five Sunday schools, which meet in the few towns and at the gathering points on the desert. There are thirty-one "points" where the residents for miles around may congregate in community meetings. Sometimes there is a schoolhouse at one of these points, and sometimes only a small building located alone in the middle of a large expanse of uninhabited sand. The settlers come to the meetings by team, on horseback and on foot, from houses that lie miles away in the desert. At twenty-four of these meeting-places, the occasional Sunday school is the only religious service. Sometimes every member of the community is present—a Sunday school with 100 per cent. attendance!

The desert missionary travels over his two-thousand-mile circuit once every six weeks, holding four to eight meetings each week. It is a fine thing to stand with him on a Sunday morning at one of these gathering-places and see the ranchers' teams in the far distance coming across the wide expanse of the valley, from houses and settlements miles and miles away, hidden by the far rim of the valley.

THE missionary speaks: "I remember standing one afternoon looking out over what seemed a gigantic bread-bowl, so far across that in its lap were the mysterious mists of distance. A feeling of awe settled over me as I realized that I was an invisible speck on its vast rim, in the presence of a world of solitude and an empire of silence. The lady at my side announced a team which she had seen through her field glasses, approaching far out across this expanse. Later I could see a ball of dust no larger than a pea moving out over the valley. After a while the shades of evening began to fall, an evening such as can be seen nowhere else than on the desert. In the east a delicate pink began to creep up the hills and slowly make its way across the sky. Then a faint blue followed up over the hills. In the west the hills stood out sharp against the bands of pink and blue like cardboard hills cut out and pasted there. Behind them a river of light, millions of miles deep streamed up silently. Then, way off on the floor of the valley, the twinkle of a camp fire showed, and my hostess said, 'Tomorrow sometime they will be here.'"

"The hills of the desert are always beautiful with their strange shapes, always rich in color. Red and yellow, white and black, gray and green, and a thousand indescribable blends of these striking pigments. Springtime brings forth the desert flowers, pale and white and exquisitely tinted. There are carpets of gold for great stretches flung in gaudy array on the desert floor. Old Baldy, nearly always snow-capped, looks down upon the desert. Great springs of water flow through the desert, sufficient to transform the country into one of garden and grain. Two great railroad lines cross the territory like a letter X,

INFALLIBLE SIGNS OF PROSPERITY. The robin is not more certainly a sign of spring than is the strike for shorter hours or higher wages a sign of impending prosperity, for scarcely will labor strike unless assured that employers are making money. May Day, 1916, saw more men and women on strike, the number being estimated variously from half a million to 900,000, than have been on strike at one time for a good many years in the United States. In New York City alone a mixed strike and lockout in the clothing trade left 60,000 operatives out of employment. A strike of towboat engineers in the harbor on May 1 practically tied up all shipping and greatly handicapped the processes by which New York supplies itself with food and disposes of its waste. Strikes in the industrial communities and among the munitions workers in the Pittsburgh district were reported to be spreading widely; and at Braddock, Pa., a combination of grievance, idleness and booze resulted in mob violence in which a number of plants were temporarily put out of action, six or seven thousand workmen not on strike were driven from their machines, and at the Edgar Thompson works of the Carnegie Steel Company two strikers were slain in a battle with armed guards. Strikes in individual plants were being rapidly settled, mostly to the advantage of the strikers, as this was being written; but a strike of railway telegraphers, an almost nation-wide strike of trainmen and a strike of anthracite miners were still impending, with the ultimate settlement in doubt. Reports of organized labor show that the year just past had been a record year in the securing of higher wages, shorter hours, and more favorable laws. Strikes increased in number, reaching about 1,500, but their duration was short. Wage increases ranged from five to fifteen per cent., and it is claimed that there is now in America no serious unemployment. Reports to the Federal Reserve Board by the banks throughout the country show that the prosperity indicated by labor unrest is a real prosperity in every branch of American business, from the production of raw materials through transportation to manufacturing.

WILL USE INTERNED STEAMERS. Chile has secured the consent of the German government to the use of three German steamers interned in Chilean ports, for commercial use along the coast of that country. The withdrawal of British steamers formerly engaged in the South American trade has reduced the tonnage available to Chilean commerce by more than fifty per cent.

TWO MAGAZINES UNITE. It was announced on April 28 that the Independent had purchased Harper's Weekly, and that these two, among the oldest American weekly periodicals, would be merged into one. Harper's Weekly has been published for fifty-nine years and the Independent for sixty-eight.

WILL PEN THE "WOLF OF WALL STREET." The Supreme Court of the United States on May 1 upheld the conviction of David Lamar, of New York, for impersonating an officer of the United States in the person of Congressman A. Mitchell Palmer of Pennsylvania. Lamar's defense had been that a congressman was not an officer of the United States within the meaning of the statute. At the time of his conviction, Lamar was sentenced to the penitentiary for two years.

THE GOVERNMENT SEEKS A CAN-OPENER. In the decision of the Federal District Court, of Baltimore, in the American Can Company case, the court, while expressing the view that the company had been an illegal growth, denominated it "a bit of perfected industrial machinery with which the court is loath to interfere unless the government demands dissolution." On May 1 the Attorney General's office filed a motion for a final dissolution decree against the American Can Company.

B. FAY MILLS DEAD. Rev. Benjamin Fay Mills, widely known as a lecturer and more widely known as an evangelist, died at Grand Rapids, Mich., on May 1, in his fifty-ninth year. In 1893 Dr. Mills represented Christianity at the congress of religions in Chicago. He was ordained in the Congregational Church in 1878 and served in pastorates until 1886, when he took up evangelistic work, being credited with having made 500,000 converts in ten years. In 1897, feeling that his views were no longer orthodox, he withdrew from the evangelistic field and engaged in independent religious work; but in 1914 he again returned to the orthodox fold, declaring that in the established faith of Christ and in that alone could the soul find peace.

REVOLUTION BY IMPEACHMENT. On May 2 certain political leaders of the Dominican Republic undertook to engineer a peaceful rebellion by the process of impeaching the president, General Jiménez. According to the law of Santo Domingo the trial would ordinarily have taken place in forty-eight hours, but it was indefinitely deferred by the arrival at Santo Domingo of Rear-Admiral Capperton with the cruiser Prairie and a strong force of marines. The American government is bound by treaty to maintain the duly constituted authorities, and the attempted impeachment, which bore evidence of insincerity, was promptly halted. Admiral Capperton and his marines have just finished the forcing of peace upon the turbulent republic of Haiti, which is now protected from itself by American supervision.

TREASURES OF THE SEA. In the last week of April two corporations were launched in New York with the owed purpose of redeeming from the ttom of the sea the treasures which pose there in the holds of sunken ssels. Both companies base their h s of profit on improved diving app atus, which will enable divers to vage cargoes of vessels lying below t 200-foot line. It is comparatively y to sit in an office in New York an igure out the billions of treasure w h is now furnishing anchorage for ba cles, and it is even probable that n h of this treasure will be redeemed man progresses in his ability to com t the forces of nature. The announc ents of the two companies in questio seem to imply a possible offering of se ities. The treasure is in the sea without ubt, but whether it offers a sufficien basis for the probable securities is an an's guess.

THE WORK OF CONGRESS. The Senate Committee on Immigrat n on April 27 eliminated from the nmigration Bill the language which ould have enacted into law the Root akahira agreement. It began to be dent early in the week that the adm stration's Philippine Bill would hav hard sledding in the House. The Den ratic caucuses on the bill in which was attempted to make it a party m sure, developed an insurrection in hich twenty-eight representatives d ared themselves unwilling to be bound the caucus to the provision guara eing independence to the Philippines thin four years. The bill was broug to a vote on May 1, and was defea d by 213 to 165. The House then, by very similar vote, passed its own , in which the Philippines are guai teed independence, but at no definit ime. The bill now goes to conferenc On April 28 it was declared that the nate Judiciary Committee would pr ably present an adverse report on the omination of Louis D. Brandeis t be a justice of the Supreme Court. ring the week conferees of the Hou and Senate were attempting to wl the Army Bill into a shape satisfac y to both Houses. The conferees nally agreed to place the new army the maximum provided in the Sena bill, which would give a force of ,000 in peace or 220,000 in times of r or of threatened danger. The co erees also agreed tentatively on the c ation of a militia reserve of approxi tely 400,000 men, and it was appare that agreement regarding the fede izing of the National Guard would t be difficult. In a letter to the Hous om-mittee on Naval Affairs, Secretar Daniels on April 30 recommended t the Naval Bill authorize an appro ation for the trial of the Neff system propulsion of submarines, which akes unnecessary the use of storage ba ries.

TO MOBILIZE AMERICAN IND TRY. A committee of 250 state direct has been organized under the Con ittee of Industrial Preparedness of the avy Consulting Board of the United ates. Howard E. Coffin is chairman, a the state directors will be under the g ance of W. S. Gifford, of the An ican Telephone and Telegraph Co any. This committee will direct the w k of the 30,000 members of various en neering societies in a complete sur y of American industries, with espec re-gard to the details as to which ants are available for the making war munitions, and just what part An ican industry could play in backing the armies that would need to be rai l for the prosecution of a war.

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE rebellion in Ireland was completely crushed during the past week. The principal effect which th uprising will have on the war in ge ral is that Great Britain will be o ged to mobilize a large number of oops, say from 125,000 to 150,000, in Ireland for a long time, as, while this rebellion is undoubtedly crushed, the Irish revolutionary societies are not, and are known to have large quantities of arms and ammunition concealed in the country. These troops could, of course, be used to greater advantage in the war itself in other spheres of action.

Premier Asquith some months ago made the statement that he would not remain a member of any government which introduced the principle of universal military service, but on May 3 Mr. Asquith introduced in the House of Commons a bill providing for immediate general compulsion for men of military age. As there is a majority in Parliament in favor of immediate compulsion, Mr. Asquith stands much more than an even chance of putting this measure through.

Another event which has contributed much to the general excitement in Greece is reported in the London Times as follows: "The pro-Bulgar sympathies of a small section of the population on the Serbo-Greek frontier are a source of considerable trouble to the Anglo-Greek staffs, and stern measures have been found necessary in order to suppress the espionage that is undoubtedly exercised on behalf of the enemy. As an instance in point, the French general staff this evening (April 16, 1916) communicates that an inhabitant of Tcherna Reka, having entrusted a letter containing information about French bivouacs and telephonic lines to a Greek soldier for transmission to the Bulgarians, he and the soldier were tried yesterday and condemned to death. The civilian was executed this morning."

The Greeks assert that this civilian Greek subject was executed on Greek territory for an offense unrecognized by the laws of Greece, by order of a foreign tribunal.

Sweden is considerably concerned at Russia's construction of permanent fortifications on the islands of the Aland Archipelago. Under the North Sea-Baltic treaty of 1908 these Aland Islands were never to be fortified, or used for any military establishment of any kind, or garrisoned. As these islands are only two hours' run from the Swedish coast, and about six hours' from Stockholm, and as Russia is a big country and Sweden a small one, the natural interest of the Swedes concerning the creation of a strong naval and military base so close to them can be understood.

Events in the Russian campaign in Asia Minor and Persia have been neither many nor interesting in the past week, and the opposing forces still find themselves in approximately the same positions they occupied at the beginning of the week.

On Sunday, there were some minor infantry charges on both the western and northern fronts of the Verdun position, which resulted to the advantage of the French, who took a hundred or so prisoners in the attack north of Cumières, but were repulsed farther to the east and northeast of Thiaumont farm on the north front. The next day there was some violent but indecisive fighting near Dead Man's Hill.

On Tuesday there were a couple of large skirmishes on the western and northern fronts, in which the French won some ground and took 100 or so prisoners. There was no infantry activity.

The western front on Wednesday was the scene only of one infantry skirmish, which took place in the afternoon of that day northwest of Le Mort Homme, when the French rushed a German position, taking it and 100 prisoners and some artillery to boot. Near Avocourt there was violent artillery activity, but on the northern and eastern fronts the artillery activity was intermittent.

On Thursday the French captured a German trench near Le Mort Homme Hill on the west Verdun front. The artillery activity was intense around Hill No. 304, and intermittent on the northern and eastern fronts.

The Germans took the offensive on the western front on Friday north of Dead Man's Hill and regained some of the ground lost earlier in the week. There was no infantry fighting on the other fronts.

The rest of the western front was fairly quiet except for some rather large skirmishes between the British and Germans near Givenchy and south of St. Eloi, and some fairly intense artillery activity on the extreme western end of the line near Dixmude, where all has been quiet for the past three or four months.

On Sunday, May 7, the Germans, according to reports from Paris, gained ground on both banks of the Meuse. French communicating trenches east of Hill 304 (which is on the west of the Meuse) were taken, and in the first French line east of the Meuse the Germans gained a footing between Haudromont Wood and Fort Douaumont. These successes were preceded by extremely violent bombardments lasting without intermission for two days, and the German attack succeeded only after repeated efforts. The report states that everywhere but at these two points the Germans were repulsed with serious losses.

It was announced at Washington on May 6 that a communication had been received by President Wilson from Pope Benedict, believed to be in the interests of the preservation of peace between the United States and Germany. It is also rumored that the note appealed to the President to initiate steps toward mediation. As its contents were guarded with great secrecy, however, it is impossible to say definitely more than that such a communication was delivered by the Papal Delegate to the United States, Mgr. Giovanni Bonzano.

The press of May 6 states that two German submarines have been observed under convoy of two commerce raiders headed westward and within 1800 miles of New York. It was surmised that the purpose of these submarines (should the report prove true) is to attack troopships and munition ships of the Allies.

Wilson's Answer to Germany

On the morning of May 9 the President's prompt reply (sent May 8) to the German note (below) was given out and reads as follows:

The note of the Imperial German Government under date of May 4, 1916, has received careful consideration by the Government of the United States. It is especially noted, as indicating the purpose of the Imperial Government as to the future, that it "is prepared to do its utmost to confine the operations of the war for the rest of its duration to the fighting forces of the belligerents" and that it is determined to impose upon all its commanders at sea the limitations of the recognized rules of international law upon which the Government of the United States has insisted.

Throughout the months which have elapsed since the Imperial Government announced, on February 4, 1915, its submarine policy, now happily abandoned, the Government of the United States has been constantly guided and restrained by motives of friendship in its patient efforts to bring to an amicable settlement the critical questions arising from that policy. Accepting the Imperial Government's declaration of its abandonment of the policy which has so seriously menaced the good relations between the two countries, the Government of the United States will rely upon a scrupulous execution henceforth of the now altered policy of the Imperial Government, such as will remove the principal danger to an interruption of the good relations existing between the United States and Germany.

The Government of the United States feels it necessary to state that it takes it for granted that the Imperial German Government does not intend to imply that the maintenance of its newly announced policy is in any way contingent upon the course or result of diplomatic negotiations between the Government of the United States and any other belligerent Government, notwithstanding the fact that certain passages in the Imperial Government's note of the fourth instant might appear to be susceptible of that construction. In order, however, to avoid any possible misunderstanding, the Government of the United States notifies the Imperial Government that it cannot for a moment entertain, much less discuss, a suggestion that respect by German naval authorities for the rights of citizens of the United States upon the high seas should in any way or in the slightest degree be made contingent upon the conduct of any other Government affecting the rights of neutrals and noncombatants. Responsibility in such matters is single, not joint; absolute, not relative. LANSING.

German Reply to Submarine Note

THE unofficial text of the reply of the German Government to the last American note was received in this country May 5, and published in ll in the press as follows:

e undersigned, on behalf of the Imperial German Governm , has the honor to present to his Excellency the Amba dor of the United States, Mr. James W. Gerard, the fol ving reply to the note of April 20, regarding the conduct of rman submarine warfare:

e German Government handed over to the proper naval au orities for early investigation the evidence concerning the Su x as communicated by the Government of the United Sta s. Judging by the results that the investigation has hit rto yielded, the German Government is alive to the po ility that the ship mentioned in the note of April 10 as ving been torpedoed by a German submarine is actually ide ical with the Sussex.

e German Government begs to reserve further communica on the matter until certain points are ascertained wh are of decisive importance for establishing the facts of the cas Should it turn out that the commander was wrong in assu g the vessel to be a man-of-war, the German Government wil ot fail to draw the consequence resulting therefrom.

connection with the case of the Sussex, the Government of United States made a series of statements, the gist of wh is the assertion that the incident is to be considered bu ne instance of a deliberate method of indiscriminate de ction of vessels of all sorts, nationalities, and destina tio by German submarine commanders.

German Government most emphatically repudiate the ass ion. The German Government, however, thinks it of litt avail to enter into details in the present state of affairs, mo particularly as the Government of the United States om ed to substantiate the assertion by reference to concrete fac

The German Government will only state that it has imposed far-reaching restraints upon the use of the submarine weapon, solely in consideration of neutrals' interests, in spite of the fact that these restrictions are necessarily of advantage to Germany's enemies. No such consideration has ever been shown neutrals by Great Britain and her Allies.

The German submarine forces have had, in fact, orders to conduct the submarine warfare in accordance with the general principles of visit and search and the destruction of merchant vessels recognized by international law, the sole exception being the conduct of warfare against enemy trade carried on enemy freight ships encountered in the war zone surrounding Great Britain. With regard to these, no assurances have ever been given to the Government of the United States. No such assurances are contained in the declaration of February 8, 1916.

The German Government cannot admit any doubt that these orders were given or are executed in good faith. Errors actually occurred. They can in no kind of warfare be avoided altogether. Allowances must be made in the conduct of naval warfare against an enemy resorting to all kinds of ruses, whether permissible or illicit.

But, apart from the possibility of errors, naval warfare, just like warfare on land, implies unavoidable dangers for neutral persons and goods entering the fighting zone. Even in cases where the naval action is confined to ordinary forms of cruiser warfare, neutral persons and goods repeatedly come to grief.

The German Government has repeatedly and explicitly pointed out the dangers from mines that have led to the loss of numerous ships.

The German Government has made several proposals to the Government of the United States in order to reduce to a minimum for American travelers and goods the inherent dangers of naval warfare. Unfortunately, the Government of the United States decided not to accept the proposals. Had it accepted, the Government of the United States would have been instrumental in preventing the great part of the accidents that American citizens have met with in the meantime.

The German Government still stands by its offer to come to an agreement along these lines.

As the German Government repeatedly declared, it cannot dispense with the use of the submarine weapon in the conduct of warfare against enemy trade.

The German Government, however, has now decided to make a further concession adapting methods of submarine war to the interests of neutrals.

In reaching its decision the German Government is actuated by considerations which are above the level of the disputed question.

The German Government attaches no less importance to the sacred principles of humanity than the Government of the United States. It again fully takes into account that both Governments for many years cooperated in developing international law in conformity with these principles the ultimate object of which has always been to confine warfare on sea and land to armed forces of belligerents and safeguard as far as possible non-combatants against the horrors of war.

But although these considerations are of great weight, they alone would not under present circumstances have determined the attitude of the German Government.

For, in answer to the appeal by the Government of the United States on behalf of the sacred principles of humanity and international law, the German Government must repeat once more, with all emphasis, that it was not the German, but the British Government which ignored all accepted rules of international law, and extended this terrible war to the lives and property of non-combatants, having no regard whatever for the interests and rights of neutrals and non-combatants that through this method of warfare have been severely injured.

Ennobled by Suffering

A SERMON BY S. PARKES CADMAN, D.D.*

TEXT—Col. 1 : 24. "And fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh."

MANY good people are troubled by being righteous overmuch, and lose their sainthood in the very act of taking pains about it. Paul was exactly opposite to this type. He was generous, quick to catch reflections, with no respect for the self-torturing energies of a vengeful and brooding mind, or for those bitter thoughts which vainly concentrate on the unchangeable past. He took scourgings, bonds, betrayals and afflictions sweetly and hopefully. Nor did his love alter when it found alteration, but strengthened and prospered in its efforts to make amends for the shortcomings and treacheries of others. His glorious and lasting experience of regenerating grace had brought him peace in the storm and rest in the conflict. He neither sought nor avoided the perils which lay around him, but subordinated them and his personal interests to the mission with which he was charged. The fires encircled him: the hot counsels of the passions bade him meet fire with fire: the cool dictates of prudence advised his retreat. But he went steadily forward, rigid of purpose, bent on the salvation of souls, and grappling splendidly with his fateful circumstances.

Beneath this decisive course lay an equally decided conviction. The apostle believed that the sons of sorrow were the sons of God: that in all their afflictions he was afflicted; and further, that whosoever was vitally united with Jesus Christ, the Son of God, was involved in his tribulations as a necessary antecedent to being made partakers of his excellence. In brief, those who suffered for the sake of righteousness, either in themselves or in their fellow men, were partners in a divine scheme, and those who refused suffering denied the Cross and had no kinship with the Crucified.

Diametrically opposed to this interpretation of the Gospel, and threatening its fundamental doctrine, is the modern theory, so fondly held and taught, that inward sanctity and release from bodily ills are one process, and that the moment we are well pleasing to God our aches and pains disappear. The fact is, when aches and pains disappear, when we no longer feel grief and solicitude for the world's sin and folly, when we cultivate comfort and ease at the cost of the nobler and sacrificial elements, God has vanished out of our lives. We have lost the radiant consciousness which cannot help being in sympathetic alliance with the woes around us, and we have forfeited the deep, exhaustless joy which belongs to those who endure for holiness and are willing, if need be, to yield their all for Christ. The ever-growing absorption of human being in the Eternal Will means expiation, surrender, unselfish devotion. And whatever its tragedies, they have played at least an equal part in the general progress of mankind toward the goal of filial obedience and the resultant harmony with One Supreme Nature.

MYRIADS of Christian believers who could not claim any part in Paul's wisdom, knowledge, intellectual power, and breadth of usefulness, have been one with him, and with his Master, in their agonizings for the church and the Kingdom. They have bled for Him who bled for them, they have gotten under the load, they have helped to make the oblation which reduces the weight of transgression. For Jesus did not die to transfer us to a realm of insensate satisfaction. He died to recrucify us, to inspire our further sacrifice, to enable his chosen ones to shine as he shone, not in fatuous complacence, but in alert, quivering pain, both of body and mind. His martyrs and missionaries and heroes have reckoned little on the life of the flesh; they have triumphed over it in the superior life of the spirit. Apart from that triumph, the church could not have persisted for a hundred years, and the world would have degenerated into abysmal sensuality. We are transformed into the heavenly likeness, not by creeds, nor deeds, so much as by the eclipse of deeds and the coronation of faith in sacrifice, the sacrifice which binds us to our severest duties with blood-red cords, and makes them an anticipation and a rapture.

What, then, shall be said of the argument that this mystery of pain proves our limitation? Simply this: it is not true. On the other hand, it proves our capacity for an infinite expansion. We suffer because we are God's, and because all that Christ has can be made ours through suffering. Heaven's chief enterprise for us is not to destroy pain, but to abolish sin; and pain is frequently used for that inclusive purpose. Rank, gross materialism exalts the physical at the expense of the spiritual. Yet the one is perishable, the other eternal. Flesh and blood do not inherit the kingdom of God, neither does corruption inherit incorruption. We are measured by our virtues and our moral achievements, not by our bodies, their stature and health. The Bible is not a medical dispensary nor a cookery book. Our altar is not a well-lined larder, our sanctuary is not a sanitarium, nor our one quest a painless physical universe. So far from the pain we feel and see being a chimerical delusion, it is the favorite instrument of sanctification.

To assert otherwise deprives Jesus of his merit and standing. He was hungry, thirsty, homeless, despised, adrift. His offense was in his stern renunciation of the glittering prizes of affluence and comfort and luxury. He volunteered for poverty, hardship, adversity, and a cruel doom. Paradoxically, he taught that these were pathways to tranquillity and power, to participation in that unconquerable mind which wore the form of a servant, and was made obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Life he had, in abundance, and he came to bestow it on men. But physical and mental isolation and inviolability are not life. They are leaden stagnation! Our life through him lies by way of Gethsemane, the Garden of the Lord: by way of the cross, whose red rain waters the Garden. Knowing this, he provided for every contingency at issue, and having attached us to that cross, bade us rejoice that we were counted worthy of the grand distinction.

SUPPOSE the first followers had abjured this residuary legateeship, and, instead of being hunted and haggard, tattered and torn, they had appeared in Rome and Athens as sleek and well-fed emissaries of deliverance from every bodily ill. The pagan hosts would have enthroned them. The feasters, fiddlers, buffoons, and dancers, who dreaded nothing more than temporal dissolution, would have hailed their advent. Nero and Domitian would have made their spurious evangel the religion of the empire. It was when they demanded that these crowned miscreants should worship a humble figure, toiling up the ascent outside the city wall, that the pride and insolence of the children of Belial broke loose. They could not discern the overwhelming strategy of Jesus, or that his broken heart was nearer to the center of things than systems wrapped up in odors, flowers, soft speech, or cults of lasciviousness and filth.

If we suffer—and who among God's faithful ones does not?—let us remember the mystic values of mortification for the soul's profit. Every pang is part of the payment the church owes to mankind, and its very presence proves that we are part of the living Body whose Head is encircled with thorns. Our rivulets of tears flow into his ocean, whose surges sanitate human life. He is our comrade in the silence and the desolation. He tells us he is with us alway, even to the end. And while we may not know when and where the suffering will cease, we do know that the consolation, the grace, the manna, are ours to receive in fulness until we have become what God means us to be. New prospects dawn on us, new vistas entrance us; we can kiss the cross and share a communion which blesses us beyond expression.

Men of all descriptions are awed and subdued before a suffering church: they often repudiate with scorn and loathing that derelict church which has lost the secret of her existence, and dwells in Laodicean lukewarmness and indifference. But the scathe of the furnace refines character and redeems us from the hardness of superficial service. It penetrates the soul, and frees it for a lowliness of demeanor and a tenderness of care that cannot be overcome by opposition. What priesthoods and kingships attend the suffering ones! What mediating efficacy, what resistless authority! They spread the fragrance of the supreme offering. They constitute the unanswerable apologetic of the church in all lands. When dismissed from earthly life, they rest beneath the altars of Paradise, and stand before the Lamb, robed in the white garments of sacrifice. They transcend the Brotherhood, and sing the anthems of the victorious Son of God.

Oh for a church whose altar is the place of a present sacrifice, who, in the midst of a perishing world, can dare and do greater things for Christ than the soldier on the field does for his nation!

FOR the church is a supreme fact in the history of the world. Theories did not create her importance; her importance created them. None can override nor minimize the reality of her faith and services. They have been manifested, not alone in the sanctuary of worship, but in the world at large. She has been public property for many cent ies, and to know her record and her capacities men ust listen to her wonderful story. They will he of a ceaseless, ordained progress in religious conq sts, expanding territories, which have been evang zed by confessors of the faith. They will mark how ese saints have appropriated the blessings of fello hip in the Life Eternal, derived from their divine rd. It will become patent that he is the risen and glo ied Head of the church, who governs and directs l as his Body. In him is her priority; through her h to be crowned as Sovereign of a new humanity. nd ignorance, imperfect sympathy, latent feuds, ca not thwart Christ's purposes, nor separate the living o anism from him. He bestowed on the church the oly Spirit, to be the indwelling Comforter and Adv ate from whom proceed her charter and authority.

Here, as everywhere, it is vitality which ec ts, and divine vitality above all else. Not the clay out the Potter, is the chief factor. The poorest h an material can be transfigured by his grace and l liness. And whatever the church is, in the ultim it can be nothing God has not decreed or that Jesus oes not desire. The Master of the household of ith will bring in the prodigal and the outcast. H ill restore them that are penitent, sanctify such a are believing, subdue opposition, allay distress, si ce controversy, put an end to war and bloodshed nd arrange all human affairs in strict accordance wit his headship. First, that which is natural, urge he Corinthian Epistle, then that which is spiritual; ew earth followed by a new heaven, which must b accomplished before the travail of nature and of nat e's Redeemer can be satisfied. These two halv of God's golden circle are to be welded into one, nd providing we do our part, he will do more tha we can ask or think. However dark the pros ts, Jesus Christ is the changeless one, the same yeste ly, today, and forever. His life circulates through ry stem and tendril of the vine; his sacrifice reddens in in the clusters of its fruit; in him the maze of bra es becomes one, the many members one body.

Why, then, the delay of his victory? Be se peace, good will and brotherhood cannot over ne the hate and strife of mankind until the churc as repented of her disunion. Few are convinced at Christ has found in her any such Body as he dem ls, or that her present sectarian and national divi ns are in any sense the last phase of the Holy S t's administration. On the contrary, they are a de departure from his primary ideal; a violation his will no longer to be excused nor palliated. T al deities have shot up on every side; artificial dis ctions and provincial interests have been accentu d. Protestants kill Protestants, and Romanists Ro nists, claiming that they kill under the inspirati of truth and justice. The Easter Feast of 1916 as been draped in crape; our joy was turned into m ning for the sins of God's people.

The church seems powerless to halt the invad or bid the marauder cease his depredations. Her her ge is sequestrated in behalf of earthly politics and th nbitions of princes who delight in war. Assuredly, se proceedings cannot stand in the judgment, nor al ys prevail in the congregation of the righteous.

The issues at stake are watched by a long-suff ng world, they are lit by the fierce glare of a fe ul struggle between the upper and the lower natur in man. Had we bestowed the same zealous care o he realities of the Gospel in which we agree that has en devoted to our respective peculiarities of belief nd practice, the Risen Jesus might have found here nd now the church which is, indeed, his Body, ali in every limb, palpitating with his instincts of love nd order, responsive to his leadership.

I am persuaded that we face a trying era, in w h the church must fill up that which is behind o he afflictions of Christ. What sufferings she has ndured! Yet have they not strengthened her i all her borders? The days of weakness and of lassi de first came—and have always come since—when he forsook the Crucified One, and submitted to he patronage of the wealthy and the great. She ill escape from this bondage; she will leave the dea to bury their dead; she will cast away the grave-cl es of an extinct past, and move forward in the pow of the Resurrection, to proclaim the Gospel of a w humanity in a reunited church and in the w d. But before she can attain these functions, she st repent, and be baptized with the baptism of he Garden and the hill called Calvary. The call of od to men everywhere is that they accept and wel e suffering, which leads to the coronation of J s. Blessed is the soul and blessed the society of ls which hears and obeys that call!

The Challenge of the Closed Door

SUNDAY, May 21. Matt. 7:7. "Knock, and it shall be opened unto you." We are more ready to speak of the challenge of the open door. Some opportunity shines before us with gates ajar, and the opening is a calling in which we hear the voice of God, "Behold, I have set before thee an open door!" But after all it is the closed door which most severely challenges our faith, and tests our ingenuity and courage. The real quality of our spirits is displayed when we have to stand knocking at the iron gate.

For instance, there is the closed door of the heart. We want to enter it with the holy love of the Lord Jesus, but it appears to be almost hermetically sealed. We knock but we get no answer. We can hear the sounds of reveling within, and we catch glimpses of many bright distractions; but we cannot persuade the much-engaged friend to heed our knockings and make room for our Lord. The world is too much with him, and he has no use for Christ. It is the challenge of the closed door! There is nothing for it but to go on knocking, in the sustaining hope that some day there may be a lull in the whirling distraction, and the door may be opened to Jesus.

And there are the iron doors of caste. What a challenge they present to the servant of the Lord! Shall we just sit down before them and wait until on some happy day they open of their own accord? Or shall we exercise a sacred inventiveness, and in a thousand gentle knockings entice the imprisoned spirits to open their doors to the Lord and Saviour of all men? There is the door of prejudice. Where strong prejudice reigns every door and window is closed. How to overcome the barrier! It is a great challenge to Christian tenacity and devotion. We are called upon to bombard the closed life with light, but the light must be sunlight; it must be both light and heat; it must be both grace and truth; it must be both wisdom and love. The friendly besiegement must go on day after day, until all opposition yields to grace, and the doors are lifted up, and the King of glory can enter in.

Anybody can enter an open door. The real challenge comes when the door is locked, and barred, and sealed. He who would open a closed mind needs a big mind. He needs the grace of magnanimity, and all that magnanimity breeds. In this ministry, little minds are altogether without resources. We need "the mind of Christ." We need a mind purified and enlarged by his saving grace, and with such endowment we can confront other minds, and by patient knockings we can persuade them to let in the King, that they also may come into possession of their great inheritance. The Life-Giving Barrier

MONDAY, May 22. Num. 16:41-50. "He stood between the living and the dead, and the plague was stayed." Israel had gone on sinning until it seemed as though nothing could avert their entire destruction. But in such emergencies the child of God betakes himself to intercessory prayer. "Moses and Aaron fell on their faces!" The case was too desperate for mortal help to cope with; and they turned to that atonement for sin which God had solemnly appointed. The propitiation made under the law sets forth, of course, the more complete and efficacious fact which underlies the Gospel; and they must be indeed blind who cannot see in Aaron's act a shadow of that interposition of our blessed Lord which arrests the despair of the convicted soul and gives peace and joy to the believing. If Aaron—the feeble, sinful type—could do so much, how much more may we not expect from Jesus, the sinless, perfect antitype?

When Aaron ran into the midst of the crowd, he found death had been before him, and he had to stand between the living and the dead. It was from the dead that the plague was passing greedily toward the living, like the licking fire which passes onward from the black ruins where it has done its work, to the things still unconsumed. But the moment Aaron arrived with the coals taken from the altar of sacrifice, the progress of the monster was checked. All who stood near him on the life-side were absolutely secure. Death could not pass from the other side to them. It was arrested as by an invisible wall. What a noble position for Aaron! But in a profounder and more universal sense, that position belongs to our Lord.

Put Christ between yourself and the second death. Believe that all the power of the enemy to hurt is barred out by your great High Priest, who bears the golden censer and stands for evermore between you and destruction. F. B. M.

The Riches of Contentment

TUESDAY, May 23. Phil. 4:11. "I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content." Paul could speak from varied experiences. He implies in the text above that as far as contentment is concerned, it must be bought by the curbing of a turbulent and a soaring ambition. "I have learned," Paul says. It was the fruit of experience. Most of us get our best fruit through personal experience, and sometimes the school is a hard one, as was Paul's.

To insist on being some one we were never intended to be; to envy somebody with whose shadows and shallows of life we are quite unfamiliar; to spoil our own happiness and roil the daily peace of our friends by petulant longings for material things out of our reach, the possession of which would probably leave us still miserable—this is a too common lot of many. Such strivings are not ideal, they are not Christian, and they destroy contentment.

That veteran story-teller for the youth of the middle-aged men of our generation, J. T. Trowbridge, wrote in his reminiscences these words, richly suggestive of his own life and the contented spiritual heights he had won:

> "Riches I have not sought, and never found,
> And fame has passed me with averted eye;
> In creeks and bays my quiet voyage is bound,
> While the great world without goes surging by.
> "No withering envy of another's lot,
> Nor nightmare of contention, plagues my rest;
> For me alike what is and what is not,
> Both what I have, and what I lack, are best."

The Defiling Contact of Sin

WEDNESDAY, May 24. Num. 19:1-22. See Ps. 51:7; Heb. 9:14. Contact with a dead body rendered the Israelite unclean, and disabled him from enjoying the privileges of the sanctuary. Many a father, like Jacob, would desire a beloved son to be with him to the last and close his eyes; and many a Joseph would covet the honor of paying the last tribute of filial affection. Yet the son who did so found himself branded by the law as unclean, and if it were the Passover time he could not keep the feast. The same disability befell those who, walking in the field, came upon a dead body, and did their duty as good citizens. If a man happened to touch a grave or a human bone, he contracted defilement, and would have been chargeable with presumptuous sin if he had ventured to set foot in the house of the Lord. All this was a parable of the ease with which the soul may contract impurity and pollution, which exclude it from the fellowship of God, and cast a cloud of darkness between the human and the divine. We cannot touch those who are dead in trespasses and sins without being defiled and needing the instant purging of our conscience from dead works.

The minute particulars about the red heifer suggest many thoughts of the close parallel between it and God's great remedy for sin; but the point which arrests us is the careful and repeated application of the living water in which the ashes had been deposited. A clean person took a bunch of hyssop, dipped it in the water, and sprinkled it on the unclean, on the third and seventh days. How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge our conscience from dead works to serve the living God! Only we must not use that grace thoughtlessly or lightly. F. B. M.

The Quality of True Friendship

THURSDAY, May 25. Mark 3:14. "And he ordained twelve, that they should be with him." Jesus was as greatly human as he was greatly divine. He needed, and he appreciated having, those about him who cared for him, and for whom he cared. Mark tells us that he appointed twelve, that they might be with him. It was not only for their sakes; it was also, we believe, for his own.

The president of one of the largest banks of New York City told the writer that after he had served for several years as an office boy in the bank over which he now presides, the then president called him into his office one day and said, "I want you to come into my office and be with me." The young man replied, "But what do you want me to do?" "Never mind that," said the president; "you will learn about that soon. I just want you to be in here with me." "That was the most memorable moment of my life," said the great banker. "Being with that man made me all that I am today."

Cyril Bailey, a popular tutor at Oxford, was asked his object as a teacher of English schoolboys. He answered thoughtfully: "I don't know that I have any object. I just like to be with these students. I get a whole lot from being with them, and I hope that they get something from being with me."

Did you ever think of what it means simply to be with the right kind of people? No one is useless, according to Robert Louis Stevenson, so long as he has a friend. Try to imagine what the disciples received by being with Jesus. Are we true friends to our friends? Do they come to us in their sorrows, and depend upon us to share their joys? A famous man once wrote to a man in trouble: "I thought you considered me your friend. And you have not asked me to share your sorrow. I could at least come and be near you in your trial." C. S. C.

First the Cross, Then the Glory

FRIDAY, May 26. Num. 21:4-10. "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness." We need hardly emphasize the comparison between the venom of the serpent and the still more virulent and dangerous poison of sin, which is to the moral nature as the serpent sting to the physical—painful, deadly, rapid in progress and certain in its effect. Sin has entered the world, and death by sin, and so death has passed upon us all.

But the outstanding peculiarity of this incident is in the cure. The brazen serpent healed those who were bitten by the fiery serpents. The Israelites beheld the figure and emblem of their own hurt on the pole in the midst of the camp; and to look steadfastly toward it wrought healing. We are reminded of the celebrated phrase of a great school of medicine: "Similia similibus curantur" (Like are cured by like). And this is exactly true of the redemption wrought by our Lord. God sent his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and in gazing on that likeness of sinful flesh we find deliverance from our own sinful flesh. He was made a curse for us, and as we behold him we are delivered from the curse. He was made sin for us, though he knew no sin, and as we trust him we are freed from the love and power of sin. The crowning sin of our race revealed itself in the crucifixion; but in that revelation we obtain salvation. The serpent may bruise his heel, but its own head is crushed. The banner-staff of the wilderness march is the cross, where Jesus was lifted up. F. M. B.

Looking Through the Telescope of Faith

SATURDAY, May 27. II Cor. 4:18. "We look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen." In this intensely utilitarian age, we are accustomed to hear the remark, "One world at a time, and that the present and practical." The heavenly realm which, to many, is unknowable, will come in its own order, if there be a future world. Paul's advice is contrary to this idea. He considered the present as transient and temporary; the future as eternal. The unseen to him was more real than the seen. This life was only the scaffolding to the eternal building, and, like a true architect, Paul beheld the completed edifice of a holy character as soon as the plans were understood. Like Moses, he walked as seeing the invisible. Without the unseen Christ and his kingdom in his soul, he could do nothing of real value; but with him he could do all things.

The ideal is ever mightier than the real, for it is the realm of the Creator, the Redeemer and the Preserver of the real. Here we are aliens; yonder, citizens. Now pilgrims; there, residents. Here, only shadows; yonder, the substance. Here, the tent pitched for a night; beyond, the permanent palace of the King. E. W. C.

Cheating the Poorhouse

A Story of a Western Heroine of the Home that Reads Like a Romantic Adventure

Here enters little Irene

ON a lonely homestead on Upper Maple Creek, deep in the coast mountains of Oregon, a woman holds the plow, a baby plays at the end of the furrows, and childish backs are bent to toil, but the poorhouse is two thousand miles away, and the banks of the streams are fragrant with bloom. The story of Mrs. Mattie Coleman is the story of courage, faith and mother love.

Left with a team and wagon, ten dollars and five children, the oldest ten years and the youngest three weeks old, Mrs. Coleman saw in the fevered dreams of long sickness the poorhouse and always the poorhouse. Before she was fully recovered she resolved to flee with her babies from the beckoning of this gloomy building with its loveless charity. Before she was able to sit up all day and when she had to entrust the driving part of the time to her ten-year-old daughter, she piled bedding, a few cooking utensils and her children into the wagon, and, with only that ten dollars, began the two-thousand mile wagon journey to Oregon.

She had a good 12-gauge shotgun with which she secured much game on the way—rabbits, doves, quail and squirrels. Her meat on the whole trip cost her just thirty cents, and it being summer the horses grazed at night at the camping-places, thus making their own living. But even so, there was flour, baking-powder, syrup, and potatoes to buy, in the purchase of which the ten dollars gradually diminished. Still, supplemented by the kindness of farmers along the way, who would bring out to camp milk for the baby, vegetables, and oftener than not some delicacy for the children, the money did not give out till the Oklahoma poorhouse had been left far behind and Mrs. Coleman felt well enough to work along the way whenever she could secure employment, cooking, canning fruit or cleaning house. She was able to get to the state of Wyoming after three months of travel.

Here she stayed during the winter, and the next spring resumed her journey toward Oregon, slowly pursuing the road across the Rockies like the pioneers of old. In Idaho she stopped a few weeks and was blessed during her stay by the friendship of a Christian woman.

FROM Idaho she went on westward, arriving in Oregon two months from the time she left Wyoming almost entirely without money. Subtracting the time she spent in Wyoming, it had taken her five months to drive from Oklahoma.

Leaving her children, the wagon and one horse with a family at Drain, in Douglas County, she borrowed a saddle, and mounting the other horse, started on a journey almost as remarkable as the one she had just completed. This long, solitary horseback ride she began with eighty cents. She rode from Drain to Scottsburg, on the Umpqua River, where she put her horse on a scow and was taken to Gardiner, the boatman giving her credit for her and her horse's fare. From Gardiner she went to Florence, on the Siuslaw River, finding on the way the homestead on Upper Maple Creek.

Because she had no money to get herself and horse across the Siuslaw, she followed the road up Maple Creek, passed through the Sweet Creek and Smith River country, forded the Siuslaw a few miles below Deadwood, rode back to Mapleton, down the north side of the Siuslaw, when new dismay! Right athwart her path there flowed another river almost as large as the Siuslaw itself, wide, deep and brimming with a flood tide. There was no bridge, no ferry, and no road around this time. It was the North Fork of the Siuslaw, and she was within a few miles of Florence and the ocean. An Indian woman rowed her across for ten cents; she sat in the stern of the boat and led the swimming horse, which once, jabbed by a passing log, jerked back with such energy as almost to capsize the shallow craft.

And the poorhouse 2,000 miles behind

Across, she climbed into the dripping saddle and rode on down to Florence, where, through the forest ranger, she made application for the claim on Upper Maple Creek. Not sure that she would get this, and hearing that there was vacant land to the north, she struck out, that same afternoon, for Heceta Lighthouse, along an inland route that she had been directed to take as being preferable during high tide to the beach.

Following this road, she came to where it forked. Taking the left-hand prong, she traveled for an hour, only to come to the edge of a lake by which the road was apparently swallowed up. This was the right road, had she but known it; wagons were accustomed to go for fifty yards along the shallow edge of Sutton Lake to avoid climbing a sand dune; but having received no mention of this in her instructions, she concluded the other fork was the right way, and rode back and took it. By this time it was beginning to grow dusk, and as she rode on rapidly the winter night settled down, filled with mist that after a while thickened to rain. At length her horse stepped upon what was apparently the beginning of a bridge, walked a little way over the resounding planks, then stopped. Unable to get him to proceed, she dismounted. Beyond was no bridge—only a wide expanse of darkness in which fish jumped and upon which the raindrops splashed. She did not know it, but this was Mercer Lake, and her horse was standing on a wharf. She rode back to Florence and stayed all night.

From Heceta Lighthouse she went to Waldport, thence up the river to the forest trail, along this trail to Toledo, thence to Corvallis, from Corvallis back to Drain; a distance of over three hundred miles alone, in the winter time, over dangerous and unfrequented roads and trails, and all on eighty cents—there is scarcely in history a more memorable journey.

IN the early spring Mrs. Coleman moved with her children to her claim. As this homestead had once been taken up and abandoned, it already had a cabin. It also had a few acres which had been cultivated. The place altogether comprises sixty acres, about a dozen of which lie in the valley and are tillable. It is the last place up on Maple Creek, and is about twelve miles from Glenada, the nearest post-office.

During the winter, previously to moving on her homestead, Mrs. oleman had cooked for an engin ring camp above Mapleton. But sh still had no money to speak of, she s in debt for the winter keep of her l ses, and the homestead would not in ediately—not for nearly a year—b productive. In the meantime they uld have to live. It began to look s if after all the idea of a homestead d a home would have to be abandon

But here enters into the story ttle Irene Coleman, aged ten, through ose efforts the home was made po ble. Wearing her best little cotton ess, this small girl, no older than the by of many a family, rode on the st to Eugene, carrying a letter to the stor of her mother's church. Out the Bethlehem of poverty though this child came, she possessed a perso lity that made people wonder. Sh was found to be quite as far advan in her books as children her age in nes of leisure and culture. "Every n it," she says, "mamma gives me out rds so I won't forget." Given a coi nd told to buy sweetmeats and h a good time, she said: "No, I'll s it and give it to mamma." The E ene papers printed the story of a ave woman's fight and the town was akened to a tender charity.

With money given by the peo of Eugene, Mrs. Coleman bought wo cows, a few chickens, food, seed, ws, paid for having a fence built and her heavy work about the place, pa off the debt of the winter keep of her ses and discharged that other debt f ner ride down the Umpqua Riv to Gardiner. Spring burst after a tle, and she put in a garden, plan a patch of potatoes, set out a all orchard, and seeded a field to grain. . . And the poorhouse is 2,000 miles ay!

A Prophet of Righteousness

THE Christian Herald announced last week the sad fact that Dr. Josiah Strong had passed from this sphere of work to one beyond our sight. His thoughts were, to the end, about the coming of God's kingdom on earth. To friends at his bedside during the last weeks and days he said repeatedly, with shining face: "The Kingdom is coming. It's coming. I see it everywhere."
